28. Mr. Gurney's steam-carriage, intended to pass on the common roads, attacked by the mob at Melksham: it was on an experimental trip to Bath.

30. Railway-tunnel under Liverpool, a mile and a quarter in length, opened to the public.

Mr. O'Connell re-elected for Clare, without opposition. His expenses were defrayed by a grant of 5000*l.* out of the catholic rent, though the grant was opposed by Mr. Eneas Macdonnell, who had himself been refused a grant in consideration of his services in the catholic cause. Mr. O'Connell delivered some stirring addresses to the electors, informing them they had achieved the glory of "converting Peel and conquering Wellington;" and that their ultimate object ought now to be a repeal of the union.

Aug. 1. Supreme court of Bavaria, after a protracted trial of four years, sentenced to perpetual imprisonment Riembauer, a catholic priest, who had long pursued a course of crime and hypocrisy. Riembauer had been held up as the model of curates; attentive to his duties, eloquent, insinuating, and graceful in person and manners. With these advantages he had succeeded in debauching many women, and then assassinated them and the offspring of his illicit amours. After conviction he admitted his mind had been corrupted by the pernicious maxim of the jesuits,—that the "end sanctifies the means;" and that it is "allowable to kill another, if there is no other means of saving one's honour or good renown."

DISTRESS AMONG WEAVERS.—In the spring and summer the depression in every branch of trade had greatly reduced the rate of wages. Artisans ascribed this reduction to the avarice of employers, and resorted to the usual expedients of combination and the destruction of property. The example began among the silk-weavers of Spitalfields. They entered the workshops, and cut and mutilated the materials belonging to refractory masters. The webs in thirty or forty looms were sometimes thus destroyed in a single night. The weavers with whom the property was intrusted were suspected of being accessory to its destruction. In the domestic manufacture the masters could have neither protection nor redress against this revengeful proceeding. They were obliged, in self-defence, to comply with the demands of the workmen, who had property at their mercy to the amount of 150,000*l.* The same system was acted on at Macclesfield, Coventry, Nuneaton, and Bedworth. In these towns the power-looms had been introduced, which enabled one man to do the labour of four. The reign of terror extended into Yorkshire, and at Barnsley a list of prices was forced on the masters. The miserable condition of the weavers was not denied. At Huddersfield it was ascertained that there were 13,000 persons, occupied in the fancy-trade, whose average earnings did not exceed 2*s.* 6*d.* per day, out of which they had to find wear and tear for looms, &c.

8. An unpopular change in the French ministry. Polignac, Courvoisier, Bournont, Rigny, Labourdonnaie, Montbel, and Crousol, were the new ministers. They were the representatives of the emigrants and the priests, favourable to irresponsible power in politics, and spiritual domination.

20. Adrianople entered by the Russians. GEORGE IV.—The king went to Snow-hill, and laid the foundation-stone of an equestrian statue to the memory of his father. He wore a blue coat, with velvet collar, white drill trousers, and light Wellington boots; a round beaver hat, without binding, and banded with a broad ribbon. The hat was worn with a dégageé air, and his majesty appeared, as was his wont on such occasions, in high spirits. It was almost the last appearance of the king in public.

Sept. 1. The London public much interested in the performances of M. Chabert, the fire-king. They were of the same kind as those before noticed in Paris (p. 338), with the addition of swallowing large doses of phosphorus and prussic acid.

14. PEACE BETWEEN TURKEY AND RUSSIA.—The Russians, under count Diebitsch had advanced within a few easy marches of Constantinople. Considering their success in the war, the terms imposed on the Porte by the victors were not, upon the face of them, very onerous. Russia obtained hardly any accession of territory by the treaty of Adrianople. The principalities of Moldavia, Wallachia, Bulgaria, and Rumelia, were to be restored. The Turks were to pay the Russians, by ten annual instalments, between five and six millions sterling, to compensate them for the expenses of the war, and the losses of their merchants. Until the last instalment be paid, the principalities not to be evacuated. The free passage of the Dardanelles and the canal of Constantinople; liberty of commerce throughout the whole extent of the Turkish empire, and the exemption of her vessels from the visits of the Ottoman authorities, were guaranteed to Russia. Russian subjects, even in Turkey, are to live under the exclusive jurisdiction and police of the ministers and consuls of Russia. This exemption from the Turkish tribunals, the heavy pecuniary mulct, and ten years' military occupation of part of the Turkish territory, formed the hardest conditions of the treaty.

23. The new post-office opened.

Oct. 5. New regulations respecting the port of London published. The day and night-duty of harbour-masters has been strictly defined. A great many new directions as to the mooring, unmooring, and removing of vessels.

6. Trial of speed between differently-constructed locomotive carriages, on the Liverpool and Manchester railway. Two of them propelled at the rate of upwards of thirty miles an-hour. A prize of 500*l.* awarded by the directors to Mr. Stephenson.

16. The Dolphin convict-hulk, with 500 convicts on board, suddenly heeled on one side and sunk; it arose from the vessel not rising with the tide, and her bottom, by suction, adhering to the mud that had accumulated during the late high tides of the Medway. Only three lives were lost.

Nov. 1. The assets of the Equitable Assurance Company, inclusive of cash in hand, and money lent on mortgage, are valued at 10,410,540*l.* There are 8867 policies existing, upon which there will be due, at the deaths of the assurers, 14,849,972*l.* Against these claims, besides the assets, are the annual premiums, amounting to 410,665*l.* The surplus of assets above all claims is estimated at about five millions.

The marquis of Stafford, who in 1820 began to regulate the rents of his English estates according to the average price of wheat, still adheres to his system. The deduction received by his tenants was highest in 1822, namely, 26 per cent.; and lowest in 1825, 16 per cent. The rents of his Scotch estates, his lordship regulates by the average price of wool, woads, and waxes: his tenants in the north received, in 1823, 40 per cent., and in 1821, 16 per cent.; which were the highest and lowest during the last eight years.

A vein of pure oil was lately struck, in boring for salt water, in Cumberland county, Kentucky. The oil welled out at intervals of from two to five minutes, pouring out at each flow barrels of oil, of a strong, penetrating, disagreeable odour, perceptible at the distance of six miles.

20. New Fleet-market opened. The shops, in general, are let at 15*s.* a week, or with a parlour, 25*s.* The street, formerly called Fleet-market, is to be called Farringdon-street.

Dec. 8. On opening the American congress, president Jackson announced that the tariff had not answered the expectations of its supporters.

29. The London booksellers have a meeting at the Chapter coffee-house, to consider of the best means of preventing the practice of selling books below the publishers' price, and at less than 25 per cent. profit allowed to the trade. A resolution, signed by 650 persons, is agreed to, that no copyright-work shall be sold at more than ten per cent. under the publishers' price, and that for ready money only, except in a case where the publisher himself had lowered the price at a trade-sale.

30. Welland canal, connecting the lakes Erie and Ontario, opened.

SUBSCRIPTION CLUBS.—The following are the names of the subscription-clubs that have been established in London, and the number of subscribers:—United Service, 1500; Junior United Service, 1500; Royal Naval, 500; Athenæum, 1000; Union, 1000; University, 1000; Verulam, 1000; Oriental, 1000; Alfred's, 500; Travellers', 500; Wyndham's, 500; Literary Union, 500; Arthur's, 800; Brookes's, 500; Boodle's, 500; Randell's, 500; White's, 500; Graham's, 500; Cocoa-Tree, 500; Portland, 500; Guards', 400; Albion, 400; Colonial, 400; St. James's, 400.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Dresden, Fred. Von Schlegel, 57, German writer, and great admirer of the Romanticæque, in contradistinction to the classical school, which his brother favoured: Schlegel was the son of a protestant clergyman, and it is likely that his overwrought impressions of the glories of the middle ages may have influenced his secession from the paternal faith to become a catholic. Sir William Curtis, 77, father of the London corporation, and late M.P. for the city. David Erskine, eleventh earl of Buchan, 86, founder of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. William Stevenson, 57, keeper of the records in the Tower, and author of a "History of Navigation." Elizabeth countess of Derby, 66, formerly Miss Farren, the actress. George lord Harris, 82, general in the army, and conqueror of Seringapatam, in 1799, when Tippoo Sultan was killed. Edward, second lord Thurlow, 47: his lordship married Miss Bolton, the actress, and was author of several poems and translations. At Paddington, Thomas Fitzgerald, 70, formerly of the victualling-office, and a poet known to his contemporaries. John Reeves, 77, late chief-justice of Newfoundland, and originator, in 1792, of the association against republicans: in 1800 Mr. Reeves was appointed king's printer, in conjunction with Messrs. Eyre and Strahan; he was a copious writer on legal and political subjects. At Aberdeen, Robert Hamilton, 86, forty years a professor in the Marischal-college, and author of an "Inquiry into the National Debt:" the professor was the first to demonstrate the fallacy of the sinking-fund, and the futility of seeking to liquidate public debts by borrowed money. At his seat, in Perth-shire, General Sir David Baird, a meritorious officer, who had seen much service in the East Indies, and lost an arm at the battle of Cornam. James Hamilton, 60, author of the system of teaching languages that bears his name. General Thomas Garth, 85; he served in Germany, in 1762, under prince Ferdinand: the general is said to have had, at an advanced age, a natural son, who bears his name, by an illustrious lady. Eugenius Roche, 43, editor of The Courier. W. M. Willett, 63, editor of The Statesman. By a fall from a post-chaise, William Wadd, 55, surgeon-extraordinary to the king, and author of several medical and amusing publications. At Paris, count de Barras, 74, member of the directory which Napoleon overthrew in 1799. At Milan, Stephen Dumont, 79, distinguished writer on legislation, and translator of Bentham's writings; a learned and amiable native of Geneva, possessed of great and polished conversational powers, and the intimate friend of the late sir Samuel Romilly and Mr. Brougham. Benjamin Flower, 74, popular political writer. John Maury, 74, celebrated mineralogist and traveller.

A.D. 1830. Jan. SOVEREIGNS IN EUROPE.—The following are the reigning contemporaries of George IV., arranged according to the order of their accession, and their age at the time of accession:—

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.—M. Charles Dupin has published some interesting comparative statements of the relative industrial force in France and England. He has calculated the amount of animate and inanimate, or the power of men and animals, and the mechanical power in the two kingdoms; and has reduced both to a common measure, expressed in an equivalent number of adult labourers or operatives. First of the agricultural force of the two kingdoms. The 31,800,000 inhabitants, which now constitute the population of France, are equivalent to a power of 12,609,057 individuals of the male sex at the age of full vigour. In France about two-thirds of the population are employed in agriculture, and one-third in manufactures and commerce. On the contrary, in Britain, of the 15,000,000 of her inhabitants, about one-third only are employed in agriculture, and two-thirds in manufactures and commerce. The following exhibits the relative amount of human and animal power devoted to agriculture in France and Britain, expressed in an equivalent number of effective labourers:—

	France.	Britain.
Horses	11,200,000	8,750,000
Oxen and Cows	17,432,000	13,750,000
Asses	240,000
Total power	37,278,038	24,632,446

This exhibits a remarkable difference in the use made of animal power by the two nations. The agriculturists of England and Scotland, by the use of domestic animals, having created a power twelve times greater than their own personal force, while the additional force obtained through similar means by the French agriculturists does not amount to five times their own. In commerce and manufactures the contrast between the two countries is greater, though not so unexpected, as in rural industry. The following exhibits the commercial and manufacturing power of France compared with that of Britain, expressed, as before, in equivalent men-power:—

	France.	Britain.
Animate force .	6,303,011	7,275,497
Mills and hydraulic engines	1,500,000	1,200,000
Windmills . . .	253,333	240,000
Wind and navigation	3,000,000	12,000,000
Steam-engines .	480,000	6,400,000

Total force 11,536,352 27,115,497

Thus the total of the inanimate force applied to the mechanical arts of all descriptions in France scarcely exceeds the fourth of the same force applied to the same purposes in Britain; and the whole animate and inanimate power of Britain, applied to manufactures and commerce, is nearly treble the amount of that so applied in France. The comparison of the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing powers of the two kingdoms, with their respective populations, also affords data for many curious inferences illustrative of the relative industrial condition of Britain and France.

Jan. 14. Bavaria reduced the interest of her national debt from 5 to 4 per cent.

15. A deputation from the city of London, in a conference with the duke of Wellington, complains of the high price of coals and the combination among the coal-owners of the Tyne.

18. A severe frost; the thermometer on Hampstead-heath 22 degrees below the freezing point. Similar weather experienced in the south of Europe.

24. Venice declared a free port.

25. DEATH OF MR. TIERNEY. — This eminent parliamentary debater was in his 74th year, and died of an enlargement of the heart, a disease that had been some years in progress, and which he bore with fortitude. He was bred to the law, and, for a short time, went the western circuit, but, marrying a lady of property, he left a profession for which he was well qualified to indulge in the less profitable but more ambitious pursuits of statesmanship. He entered the house of commons in 1796, about the time the whigs, in a pettish fit, withdrew from it, under an impression that their efforts to save the country would be unavailing and hopeless; retaining, however, contrary to the example of Grattan and the other contemporary seceders from the Irish parliament, their seats the while. The secession was a piece of effeminacy that would now be laughed at, and certainly not tolerated in any class of public servants intrusted with representative duties. During their absence, Mr. Tierney, who had not been regularly incorporated into the opposition, remained behind as a kind of rear-guard to watch the enemy and report his movements. He was treasurer of the navy under Mr. Addington, but on the overthrow of that gentleman's ministry, by a coalition, he rejoined his old friends, to whom he ever after faithfully adhered, and of whom he was for many years the leader. He was a shrewd, plain, argumentative, and humorous speaker, without any pretension to oratory or refinement of thought. His analysis of the annual budget was usually his most masterly exhibition. After an early period of life he fought a duel with Mr. Pitt. He had a deep sense of religion, and some qualities have been ascribed to him (Edinburgh Review, cxxxvii. 249) that seem almost incompatible with his temperament and strength of intellect. He was timid in council, disposed to dwell on the gloomy side of things, and on all possible contingencies. He was not in truth deeply versed in general principles, not even in those of political economy, and, on one occasion, committed the error of ascribing public distress to large farms and the over-application of capital to land. Mr. Tierney was the author of some clever pamphlets; he also drew up the admirable petition of the Society of the Friends of the People, showing the defects of the representative system, and which, in 1793 (see p. 582), was presented to parliament.

Feb. 4. Mr. Alexander, editor of the Morning Journal, sentenced to sundry fines and imprisonment for libels on the duke of Wellington and his ministry. The prosecutions had been instituted by the attorney-general, sir James Scarlett, and were generally disapproved.

POSITION OF THE MINISTRY. — Parliament met on the 4th inst. and found the government in a difficult position. By extraordinary energy it had carried catholic emancipation; but in so doing had lost the support of a powerful section of adherents, who, holding themselves to have been betrayed, had been converted into determined opponents. As a set-off to this defection, ministers had gained the support of the whigs, who were willing to lend them such assistance as would save them from seeking a reconciliation with the offended tories; but this assistance was wavering and not wholly disinterested. They naturally and reasonably sought coalition in office as well as in parliament. They had no desire, therefore, to render the ministry independent; their policy was to administer sustenance enough to keep it alive but not to establish it in the robustness of perfect health. The duke of Wellington, on the other hand, sought their aid in the legislature, not their co-operation in power. He would still have preferred a reconciliation with his old friends, and to keep the way open for them, stood aloof from an official union with the whigs. The former, however, manifested not the slightest disposition towards peace and forgiveness. The party of which Mr. Canning had been leader, and which, after his death, acknowledged the supremacy of Mr. Huskisson, would have brought both influence and talent; but the expulsion of Huskisson from the cabinet had been too ignominious to leave any hope of his return unless the duke would make submissions which neither his situation nor his unbending character would allow. In the house of commons, therefore, the ministry was weak, the ablest members being mostly lukewarm or hostile. With the exception of Mr. Secretary Peel, who tried to fill the place of leader, there was no one fitted efficiently to fight their battles in debate—no one that held a high place in public opinion for intelligence and oratory. More auxiliaries or fewer enemies, therefore, became indispensable. The desertion of the whigs, and their coalition with his tory opponents, would have at once terminated the duke's ministry. To attach the former to his standard became the obvious policy of the prime minister. The marquis of Cleveland, a great borough-proprietor, under whose patronage Mr. Brougham had long sat in parliament, was the first to lend his aid to the government, and his son, lord Darlington, undertook to move the address (Ann. Register, lxvii. 3). Another whig lord, the duke of Devonshire, was conciliated by the appointment of Mr. Abercrombie, his lordship's land-agent, and late of the chancery bar, to be chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland. This could only be considered an instalment, not the full purchase-money, of the entire services of the opposition. Parliament was opened by commission. The royal speech dwelt on our amicable relations with foreign powers, increased amount of exports, deficiency in the revenue of the previous year and necessary retrenchments, proposed improvements in the administration of the law, partial distress among the agricultural and manufacturing classes owing to unfavourable seasons and other causes not under legislative control. An amendment to the address was moved in the upper and lower house on the ground that the distress was universal, not partial; in the lords it was negatived by 71 to 9; in the commons by 158 to 105.

9. Public meeting at Sydney, New South Wales, to petition parliament for a legislative assembly and trial by jury.

16. English Opera House and five houses adjoining destroyed by fire. Mr. Arnold, the proprietor, was not insured.

Mar. 2. French chamber of deputies opened by Charles X. The opposition to the ministry of prince Polignac was kept up, both in the chambers and by the liberal journals, with unabated bitterness. The king's speech was threatening, and implied a fixed determination on his part to support the ultra-royalist administration he had formed. In their address, in answer, the deputies openly declared that the government had not their confidence, and that "an unjust distrust of the sentiments and reason of France is now the fundamental idea of the administration." The public discontents were great; in Brittany an association had been formed for refusing payment of taxes, if the charter should be violated; the editors of the Globe, the National, and other popular journals, were prosecuted for libels and sentenced to fines and imprisonment.

15. In bringing forward the budget, the chancellor of the exchequer announced the total remission of the excise-duties on beer, cider, and leather. The deficiency of revenue occasioned thereby, amounting to five millions, he proposed to meet by assimilating the Irish stamp-duty to that of England, and increasing the duties on spirits. The economical reductions in different departments of government amounted to 1,300,000*l*. Efforts were made to improve the bill for the disfranchisement of East Retford, and the extension of the franchise to the adjoining hundred. Mr. Tennyson moved to transfer the right of returning members to Birmingham. Mr. Hobhouse, on the third reading of the bill, on the 15th, proposed its rejection altogether, and, on failing that, Mr. O'Connell moved that the poll in the borough and hundred should be taken by ballot. This was a novel principle in parliamentary election, and rejected by 179 to 21.

19. Session of the Swedish diet closed; the king congratulated the assembly in his speech on the advancing prosperity of the kingdom, stating that the population had increased one-sixth within twenty years, the national debt was nearly extinguished, and the taxes considerably reduced.

19. French chamber of deputies prorogued preparatory to their dissolution and a new election.

25. The king of Spain abolishes the Salic law, which excluded females from succession to the throne.

Apr. 15. First bulletin issued announcing the illness of George IV. On the 12th the king rode in Windsor-park for the last time, and passed some time in the menagerie, a place in which he took great delight. While there he complained of pain and faintness, and inquired of the keeper if he had any brandy in the house. The man, an old servant of the duke of York, said he had something which he thought his majesty would like better than brandy. "What is it?" said the king. "Cherry gin," was the reply; "it was made by my old woman, sirs." His majesty seemed much pleased by this mark of attention, and expressed a wish to taste the "old girl's cordial." On its being handed to him he appeared to relish it exceedingly, and finished the remainder of the bottle.

May 3. Died, in his 80th year, sir ROBERT PEEL, father of the secretary of state for the home department. He was among the first and most successful of the natives of Lancashire who plunged into the golden flood that flowed into the country on the sudden expansion of the cotton-trade. In 1773 he established, in conjunction with Mr. Yates, an extensive manufactory at Bury, which rose into a state of unequalled prosperity. In 1803 they employed 15,000 persons, and paid 40,000*l.* annually to the excise as duty on printed goods. Mr. Peel married, in 1787, the daughter of his partner, then in her seventeenth year, by whom he had six sons and five daughters. About this period he made some large purchases of landed property in the counties of Lancaster, Stafford, and Warwick, and in 1790 was returned member for Tamworth, previously to which he had published a pamphlet with the paradoxical title of "The National Debt productive of National Prosperity." He was a strenuous supporter of Mr. Pitt, and, in the eventful emergencies of 1798, when government made an urgent appeal to the loyalty of the community, the firm of Peel and Yates subscribed 10,000*l.* for the support of the war. Mr. Peel, in 1801, was created a baronet. In his political capacity he seems to have committed the common error of being carried away by present and the local appearances in his own neighbourhood rather than a comprehensive estimate of national and final results. He died possessed of immense riches, the fruits of well-timed enterprise, and not parsimoniously heaped up, but accompanied with much active benevolence and a generous munificence.

14. Sir James Graham moved in the house of commons for a return of the salaries and emoluments of the members of the privy council. He said the total number of privy councillors was 169, of whom 113 received public money to the amount of 650,164*l.* There were 47 peers and 21 commoners who were privy councillors; the former received 378,346*l.*, the latter 90,849*l.* per annum. The chancellor of the exchequer moved an amendment for a return of salaries and emoluments above 250*l.* paid by all persons in the civil departments of the united kingdom. Amendment carried. Sir James remarked that he "had called for a glass of wine, and Mr. Goulburn had served him with a glass of wine diluted with a bottle of water."

21. Prince Leopold declined the sovereignty of Greece, offered to him by the allied powers.

24. Message from the king to parliament, stating his inability to affix the sign-manual to public instruments. A commission was appointed, and an act passed and received the royal assent on the 29th to legalize the use of a stamp. The bulletins issued had been concocted in such vague, unmeaning language, that this was the first public indication of the dangerous and hopeless condition of his majesty.

The French newspapers contained numerous and distressing accounts of fires in Normandy and Brittany, supposed to be occasioned by incendiaries.

28. Motions by lord John Russell and Mr. O'Connell for parliamentary reform.

June 3. Mr. Sadler moved for the introduction of poor-laws into Ireland: negatived without a division.

7. A musical performance, of a novel description, took place at the Egyptian-hall. The performer was Michael Ball, and his instrument his chin, played upon by the knuckles of his two fists. The tones he produced were something similar to the castanets, and the rapidity and precision of his execution extraordinary.

12. Will of the late sir Robert Peel proved; personal property sworn to exceed 1,200,000*l.*

24. Informations laid by the managers of Drury-lane and Covent-garden theatres against the minor theatres, for alleged infringements of their patent right, by performing the regular drama.

26. DEATH OF GEORGE IV.—For many years the king had been scarcely ever free from gout, but its attacks had been resisted by the uncommon strength of his constitution. His life had in consequence been retired. During the spring of 1829 he resided at St. James's-palace, where he gave a ball to the juvenile branches of the nobility, to which the princess Victoria and the young queen of Portugal were invited. Mostly his time was spent within the limits of the royal domain at Windsor. His out-door amusements consisted of sailing and fishing on the Virginia-water, or a drive in a pony-phæton, in the magnificent purlieus of the forest. When the weather was unfavourable, the light reading of the day, or the drama, was resorted to. Almost uninterrupted attacks of illness disturbed his seclusion, while they offered an inducement to its continuance. Pains of the eyes, and defective vision, gout in the feet and hands, and, lastly, the great malady of his family—dropsy, to which the duke of York, and his sister, the queen of Wurtemberg, had fallen victims, by turns befel him. In April his malady assumed a decisive character, and bulletins began to be issued. He had reached his sixty-eighth year, a term rarely allotted to the wearer of a crown. In May, a commission was appointed to affix the royal signature; the king signifying his consent by word of mouth. Before his death it was with difficulty he could whisper his verbal affirmative. About a week before he died the physician delicately announced to him the inevitable catastrophe. "God's will be done!" was the reply. The king's faculties continued unimpaired to the last moment. On administering to him the last sacrament, the bishop of Winchester reminded him of the duke of Sussex; when the king charged the prelate, after his death, to carry a message to the duke, saying all offences were forgotten, and to assure him of fraternal affection. His majesty's sufferings were very great; during the paroxysms of pain his moans were heard even by the sentinels on duty in the quadrangle. On the night of the 25th his cough was unusually painful, and he motioned a page to alter his position on his couch. Towards three o'clock he felt a sudden attack of the bowels, and desired to be removed to his chaire percée; a violent discharge of blood ensued, and his majesty appeared to be fainting. At this moment he attempted to raise his hand to his breast, and faintly ejaculated, "Oh God! I am dying;" and two or three seconds after he said, "This is death." The king was removed to his couch, and the physicians called. Before they arrived the glaze of death was over the eyes of the king, and George IV. had ceased to breathe. A post-mortem examination showed diseased organization of the heart. That organ was uncommonly enlarged, and adhered to the neighbouring parts. There was no effusion of water in the thoracic cavity. The liver was not diseased; the lungs were ulcerated, and there were dropsical symptoms of the skin in various parts of the body. The king was an unusually large, and well-proportioned man. At one time he weighed twenty-four stone. His eyes were good, but his features and countenance did not equal his fine form and noble mien.

PUBLIC STATUTES. I. TO XI.

GEORGE IV.

1 Geo. IV., c. 1. Civil list act.

Cap. 2. Granting privileges of British ships to ships built at Malta, Gibraltar, and Heligoland; and some of them to ships built at Honduras.

Cap. 26. Encouraging coasting-trade of Ireland.

Cap. 87. Enabling landlords more speedily to recover possession of lands and tenements unlawfully held over by tenants. Act extends to the united kingdom, except Scotland.

1 & 2 Geo. IV., c. 18. Repeals Irish act, 28 Eliz., c. 2, which punishes witchcraft and sorcery. Statute against witchcraft in England had been repealed in George the Second's reign.

Cap. 26. For gradual resumption of cash-payments by the bank of England.

Cap. 40. Repeals capital punishment of bankrupt who conceals his effects, and substitutes transportation.

Cap. 41. For abating nuisance from steam-engines, by facilitating prosecution thereof.

Cap. 47. Borough of Grampound disfranchised, and two additional members in lieu given to Yorkshire.

3 Geo. IV., c. 41. Repeals nearly 200 ancient statutes relative to the export and import of various articles; commerce of aliens and denizens; import of popish books; guaging of wine, and other matters. Most of the repealed statutes had become obsolete.

Cap. 53. Regulates the sale of roasted corn, peas, beans, and parsnips.

Cap. 71. Prevents cruelty to cattle.

Cap. 126. For amending the laws relative to the turnpike-roads in England.

4 Geo. IV., c. 52. Abolishes the custom of putting suicides in the highway, with a stake driven through the body; substitutes nocturnal interment, without christian rites of burial.

Cap. 64. Consolidates and amends the laws relative to gaols and houses of correction in England.

Cap. 76. General marriage act.

Cap. 83. Regulates factors and agents, amended by 6 Geo. IV., c. 94.

Cap. 99. For effecting a composition of tithes in Ireland.

5 Geo. IV., c. 74. Establishes uniformity of weights and measures in Britain.

Cap. 83. General vagrant act.

Cap. 96. Consolidates and amends the laws relative to the arbitration of disputes between masters and workmen.

6 Geo. IV., c. 16. Consolidates and amends the bankrupt-laws.

Cap. 50. Consolidates and amends the jury-laws.

Cap. 63. For better preserving the health of children employed in cotton-mills.

Cap. 79. For assimilating Irish to British currency.

Cap. 91. Repeals part of 6 Geo. I., c. 18, which was passed to restrain the extravagance of mercantile speculations, and commonly called the "bubble act."

Cap. 97. For better preserving peace and good order in the English universities.

Cap. 129. Repeals all the statutes from 33 Edw. I., downwards, so far as they relate to combinations of workmen, hours of labour, or rate of wages; but provides punishment for threats, violence, or molesting other workmen.

Caps. 104 to 112. Relate to the management of the customs; navigation and registry of ships; the warehousing of goods, and the prevention of smuggling; forming a new and consolidated body of the numerous statutes relative to these subjects, and relaxing the exclusiveness of the old navigation-laws.

7 Geo. IV., c. 6. Prohibits the circulation of small notes for sums under 5*l.*, after April 5th, 1829.

Cap. 34. Discontinuing bounties on salmon and other fisheries.

Cap. 46. Amending law relative to banking firms, and allowing more than six partners to carry on banking, distant 65 miles from London.

Cap. 57. Consolidates and amends the insolvent debtor laws.

Cap. 64. Improving administration of criminal justice.

7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 18. Prohibits the use of spring-guns, man-traps, and other engines, calculated to destroy human life, or inflict grievous bodily harm, except in dwelling-houses, between sunset and sunrise.

Caps. 27 to 31. Repeal various ancient statutes relative to benefit of clergy, larceny, and other offences; malicious injuries to property; remedies against the hundred, and consolidates and amends their provisions; being a continuation of Mr. Secretary Peel's criminal law reforms.

Cap. 58. For ascertaining the average prices of British corn, to regulate the duties on importation.

Cap. 71. Abolishes arrest for debt on mesne process, where cause of action is less than twenty pounds.

9 Geo. IV., c. 14. Promise of adults to pay debts contracted in infancy, or representations of the character, credit, or conduct of another, not valid without a memorandum in writing.

Cap. 17. Repeals corporation and test acts.

Cap. 22. Consolidates and amends laws relative to controverted elections of members of parliament.

Cap. 31. Consolidates criminal statutes relative to offences against the person.

Cap. 32. Quakers and Moravians allowed to make their solemn affirmation, in lieu of an oath, in criminal and civil cases.

Cap. 60. General act, fixing the scale of duties on the import of corn, varying with the average prices in the home-market. When wheat is 62*s.*, and under 63*s.* per quarter, duty 1*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*; when at or above 73*s.*, duty 1*s.* per quarter, with intermediate rates of duty. Oats, rye, and flour, maize, or Indian corn, subject to varying rates of duty.

Cap. 61. General act, licensing ale-houses.

Cap. 66. Repeals acts offering rewards for discovery of longitude, or northern passage between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Cap. 92. Consolidates and amends laws relative to savings-banks.

10 Geo. IV., c. 1. Suppresses catholic associations, and other dangerous assemblies in Ireland.

Cap. 7. Catholic relief bill.

Cap. 8. Disfranchises the forty-shilling freeholders in Ireland, and prohibits any one voting for county members, unless possessed of a freehold estate of ten pounds a-year.

Cap. 44. For improving the police of the metropolis, by abolishing the parochial watch, and placing the entire police of metropolitan district under the control of two commissioners. (Sir Robert Peel's act.)

Cap. 56. Consolidates and amends laws relative to friendly societies.

FINANCE, TAXES, AND LOANS.

THE several measures noticed in the Chronicle will have shown that the present reign was fertile in expedients, often more ingenious than solid, for bettering the national finances. Little can be gained by mere dexterity in finance; all attempts at legerdemain are futile, and a nation, like an individual, can only become rich either by an increase of income or reduction of expenditure. The most novel scheme of the period, the conversion, in 1822, of the military and naval half-pay and pensions, and civil superannuations, into a fixed annuity for forty-five years, was perfectly illusive as to absolute gain to the nation. It was nothing more than the continuance, under a new form, of the old system of loans, of anticipating distant resources, and throwing the burden of the present on the next generation. The reduction of the Navy five per cents. to four, and, two years after, the reduction of the four per cents. to three and a half, effected a material saving to the public at the expense of the holders of this description of stock. Important savings were also made by the abolition of offices, and the reduction of establishments. From the termination of the war up to 1823, the taxes repealed amounted to 25,456,202*l.*, and the new taxes imposed to 3,200,900*l.* In 1824 taxes were repealed to the amount of 1,727,000*l.*, and in 1825 to the amount of 3,146,000*l.* (Ann. Reg., lxi. 117; lxxiii. 70.) This large remission of taxes was, however, more nominal than real, owing to the rise in the value of money, and as a source of relief to the community was more than counterbalanced by the general fall in prices, wages, rents, and profits.

The following statement, continued from p. 754, exhibits the nett income of the United Kingdom during the reign of George IV., from taxes and loans (the last inclusive of exchequer-bills funded, and the excess of issued):—

Years.	By Taxes.	By Loans.
1821	£59,791,078	£13,030,784
1822	59,219,601	15,763,217
1823	57,872,430	6,925,000
1824	59,388,111	9,798,100
1825	57,640,509	4,507,500
1826	55,186,369	19,234,330
1827	55,255,408	7,926,738
1828	56,737,175	3,082,500
1829	55,283,219	3,659,458

COMMERCE, NAVIGATION, SHIPPING.

The present reign is remarkable as the beginning of a new era in commercial legislation; and those principles of unrestricted intercourse among nations, which sir James Steuart and Adam Smith demonstrated to be most conducive to their mutual benefit, at length found their way into the British parliament. The Marquis of Lansdowne in the upper house, and Messrs. Huskisson, Robinson, and Poulett Thomson in the lower, were the most persevering advocates of the new policy. It found favour even among practical men, and petitions in favour of ~~new~~ TRADE were presented from the leading merchants of London, Glasgow, and Bristol. This concurrence of existing interests with the deductions of science slowly overcame the repugnance of the government to change, and important alterations in mercantile law were made during the administration of the earl of Liverpool. In the first place, some hundreds of obsolete statutes relative to commerce, aliens, and denizens, were wholly repealed; the strictness of the navigation-laws, which required that the transit of goods should be in British bottoms, navigated by British seamen, was relaxed; bounties and other expedients for the encouragement of the fisheries of Britain and the linen manufacture of Ireland were abolished, and was allowed to be exported, and manufactured silk, and other foreign products to be imported; greater facilities were granted for warehousing foreign commodities in English ports; and lastly, the colonial trade was partly thrown open to foreigners. The old mercantile notions respecting colonies had been that they were planted and protected solely for the use of the mother country; that they had no right, as Lord Chatham said, to make "a nail for a horse-shoe for themselves;" all that they produced ought to be brought to our market, all they consumed ought to be purchased exclusively of ourselves: in short, no alien party ought to interfere either as buyers, sellers, or carriers. Under this system reciprocal injuries were inflicted; both parties were impoverished, for both were often compelled to buy articles dearer and worse of each other than they could obtain from strangers.

The principle of free trade was only entered upon in the reign of George IV., and, having to contend against long-cherished prejudices, old monopolies, and often apparently conflicting interests, it was not vigorously and uniformly carried out in that of his successor. There appears, however, no serious ground of apprehension from its unlimited application. It is chiefly in rural industry that we have to apprehend competition; in most other branches we are paramount; and it is a mistake not less odious than selfish, even of the agriculturists, to cherish the impression that they can permanently have a good home market for themselves, while they discourage a good foreign market for our own merchants and manufacturers. For a rich and populous community to be wholly independent of other states for a supply of the staple articles of food, is neither possible nor desirable. By occasionally being the customers of the North of Europe for corn, we promote, under the temptation of this contingency, its cultivation, and Poland thus becomes to England, what Sicily was to the Romans, a granary to which we can resort in the eventual failure of our own crops. The principle of the corn-laws has another evil tendency by operating as a bad example to our neighbours, and affording them a pretext which has been often urged, for levying protecting duties on our manufactures in retaliation for the duties we levy on the produce of their own soil. We thus, by the precedent of a baneful legislation, keep alive the reciprocal jealousies and injuries of a system that ought to be obsolete, and in the entire annihilation of which no people in the world are so deeply interested as the British.

that called in the aid of the skill, capital, and enterprise, we suffer proportionately more than other countries by a restrictive policy that fetters the intercourse of nations.

Leaving these economical considerations, we turn to the progress of British commerce since the peace, the period at which we terminated our former notice of this subject. The following statement of the official value of exports from and imports into Britain, includes, in the former, the aggregate of British, Irish, colonial, and foreign commodities exported. Exhibiting the aggregate of exports is more convenient for comparison, as the same mode of statement was adopted on a former occasion (p. 724) in showing the progress of commerce during the war. Except during the three years of inordinate speculation in the export of colonial products that immediately followed the overthrow of Napoleon, the average exports of colonial and foreign products has been about ten millions, which, deducted from the total of exports, as given below, will show the amount of British and Irish produce and manufactures sent out of the united kingdom:—

Year.	Exports.	Imports.
1817	48,215,186	26,374,921
1818	49,502,738	29,910,502
1819	52,796,300	35,845,340
1820	41,862,925	29,681,640
1821	47,345,319	31,515,222
1822	50,796,771	29,769,122
1823	52,770,216	29,482,376
1824	51,755,035	34,591,264
1825	58,213,548	36,056,651
1826	55,608,327	42,660,954
1827	50,399,357	36,174,330
1828	61,085,445	43,489,340
1830	66,071,164	42,311,649

The barometer which measures commercial prosperity is not a favourable balance of trade or excess of exports, as it was formerly considered to be, but the aggregate of the two—exports and imports. It is these together which indicate the industrial activity and social enjoyments of nations. Referring to this test, we have satisfactory evidence of the unequalled prosperity of the empire since the peace. But the increase in the real or declared value of exports has not kept pace with the increase in the official value, which measures not the market value, but the quantities exported. This will appear more striking from the subjoined comparison of the official and declared value of the exports of British and Irish (excluding foreign and colonial) produce in the years 1815 and 1830:—

Year.	Official Value.	Declared Value.

So that, while, in fifteen years, the quantities had increased in the proportion of 32 to 55, their money value had absolutely become less in the proportion of 43 to 35. This singular revolution in the custom-house returns has been before adverted to (p. 755), and is mainly the result of our extraordinary mechanical improvements, especially in the application of steam-power, and which has enabled our merchants and manufacturers to offer, and the spirit of competition left them no other alternative, double the amount of goods for the same price in 1830 that they offered in 1815. Our cheap cottons, linens, hardware, &c., have thus been as serviceable to our neighbours as ourselves, and unaccompanied with loss; for we, doubtless, received what we deemed a profitable equivalent in return.

• ENUMERATIONS OF THE PEOPLE.

In the last notice of this subject (p. 638) we remarked on the dilatoriness manifested by parliament in not instituting, at an earlier period, an authentic inquiry into the amount of the population, and on the conflicting opinions that had prevailed on the actual number of the people. This omission has been amply supplied by four distinct censuses of Britain, taken in 1801, 1811, 1821, and 1831. These decennial enumerations have led to very important conclusions, and throw great light on the social progress of the nation. First, it appears that since the commencement of the present century population has been increasing with unexampled rapidity, especially in the cities and towns; secondly, that the duration of human life has been greatly extended; and, thirdly, that the industrial character of the community has changed, and manufacturing obtained an ascendancy over agricultural employments.

It was not till 1821 that a complete census was taken of Ireland, and which was repeated in 1831. The population of Ireland has been found to increase considerably faster than in Scotland, but not so fast as in England. As the relative wealth of Scotland has probably increased more rapidly than in England or Ireland, the causes that have counteracted a corresponding increase of population must be sought in the consolidation of farms, extensive emigrations, better education of the people, and greater mortality of the towns, owing probably to spirit-drinking, and the crowded mode of living of the inhabitants. "In Edinburgh," Mr. McCulloch says, "there are nearly 16 individuals to each house; and at an average there are 8·276 inhabitants to a house in the great towns of Scotland, while in those of England the average is only 6·165."—(Statistical Account of the British Empire, i. 428.) In Wales population has increased slower than in any division of the empire. The principality is mountainous and sterile; its predominant occupations agriculture and mining, neither of them favourable to a rapid increase of people, especially if the former has not been accompanied, as in Ireland, by a minute subdivision of landed property.

A remarkable result established by the parliamentary censuses was the diminished rate of mortality. In 1780 the annual mortality of England and Wales was 1 in 40; in 1801 it was 1 in 46; and in 1830 it had decreased to 1 in 58. (Porter's Progress of the Nation, i. 24.) This improvement in the public health may be ascribed to better food, clothing, lodging, and medical aid; more temperate habits of living; greater cleanliness in our persons and dwellings; the introduction of vaccination, and the greater salubrity of the climate from extensive surface-drainage of stagnant water. The description of prevailing diseases, as well as the duration of life, has undergone remarkable changes. Those sweeping epidemics and contagious maladies that formerly carried off one-third or one-fourth of the entire population, seldom or never visit us. There are fewer births in a family, but, owing to superior nurture, a larger number attain maturity. At the beginning of the century one-third more children died of convulsions than at present. Small-pox destroyed half as many again, and teething one-third more than it does now. Hooping-cough, asthma, cancer, and apoplexy, may have increased, but leprosy, scurvy, cholera, and rickets, have nearly or entirely disappeared. The decrease in fevers, the stationary number of suicides, and the increasing number of those dying of old age and natural decay, afford strong evidence of the improved condition of society.

The third feature of interest disclosed by the censuses is the transposition of the industrial ratios. In 1700 the population of the agricultural counties of England appears to have been double that of the manufacturing counties, and about equal to that of metropolitan counties. These proportions began to alter about the middle of the century, and the manufacturing and metropolitan districts continued to gain on the rural, till in 1801 the proportions were respectively 25, 31, 26. In 1811 the population of the manufacturing counties rather exceeded that of the agricultural. In 1831 and 1831 the numbers of the three descriptions of population were as follow:—

Metropolitan	4,298,317	4,952,661
Manufacturing	3,591,204	4,406,014
Agricultural	3,368,418	3,728,000

Mr. Marshall has given the following table of the increase per cent. of the different kinds of population since 1700:—

ENGLAND:	1801 to 1811	1811 to 1821	1821 to 1831	1700 to 1831
Agricultural	9½	15½	10½	84
Manufacturing	18½	20½	22½	295
Metropolitan	16½	18½	15½	147
Total { England	14½	17½	16	154
{ Wales	13	17½	12	117
{ Scotland	13	15	13	87
GREAT BRITAIN	14½	17½	15½	144

In Scotland there has been quite as great a change in the pursuits of the people. There the proportion of non-agriculturists to agriculturists has risen from five to six in 1801, to nine to five in 1821, and in 1831 the proportion was about two to one, as in England. In no other European state is there probably such a division of employments. In Italy, according to professor Babbage, the proportion of agriculturists to non-agriculturists is as 100 to 31; in France, as 100 to 50; in Ireland the numbers are about equal.

In four rural districts the increase of population, during the last thirty years, has been only 30 per cent.; in London, 58 per cent.; in ten large manufacturing towns 80 per cent., and in three of the largest manufacturing towns, no less than 100 per cent., or exactly double.

The progress of population has far outstripped the calculations of political arithmeticians. Gregory King, one of the most ingenious and best informed of this class, whose calculations we have formerly quoted (p. 266), estimated that the population of England and Wales would in the year 1800 amount to 6,420,000; in 1900 to 7,350,000; in 2000 to 8,280,000! (D'Avenant's Works, ii. 177.) So that the population of England, according to King's estimate, would, 170 years hence, only exceed by a trifle the actual population of Ireland at the period of the last census.

The following tables comprise the chief statistics, illustrative of the subject of this section, to the end of the reign of George IV. :—

Manchester, Glasgow, and Paisley, show the progress of the cotton-manufacture; Leeds of the woollen; Norwich of the crape; Nottingham of the hosiery; Bradford of stuff; Macclesfield and Coventry of silk; Birmingham and Sheffield of hardware. The chief commercial ports are Liverpool, Bristol, Hull, Newcastle, Aberdeen, Dundee, and Belfast. Portsmouth and Plymouth are the great naval arsenals of the united kingdom.

PROGRESS OF EDUCATION.

The peace and prosperity of the present reign were highly favourable to the progress of popular instruction, and this desirable result was effected by the voluntary efforts of the people themselves, unaided by the powers of the government. In the great work of teaching the poor, all parties and persuasions united with the most laudable zeal. The belief that universal education could have any injurious effect upon the character of the community was entirely exploded, and the results of some inquiries that were instituted in 1828, by Mr. Brougham, showed that a great progress had been made since our last notice of this subject (p. 756), and that at the close of George IV.'s reign there were few districts in England where the children of the working classes might not obtain elementary instruction. The information obtained was far from complete, but there were materials sufficient for drawing up the following comparison of the number of children who attended unendowed Day-schools in 1818 and 1828 in those parishes from which returns were obtained:—

WILLIAM IV. A.D. 1830 to 1837.

CONSTITUTIONAL agitations on the Continent and in England form a distinguishing feature of the present reign. It is a brief period, but replete with interesting and important events. William IV had scarcely acceded to the British throne, ere an astounding revolution burst forth from the capital of France, as unexpected by the European nations in the mode of its achievement as in the rapidity of its consummation. A crisis had arrived between conflicting parties, and the government of Charles X sought, by one audacious blow, to strike down the liberal spirit; it was no longer able, successfully, to contend against it. It was a tiger-spring, which failed; the assailant fell, the unpitied victim of a will and deadly aim.

Restored by the foreign powers, in 1814, after being ignominiously expelled by the public voice, the return was compulsory, and the Bourbons never accumulated in heart or mind with the French nation. Their history, like that of the Stuarts, offers a sad example of the inveteracy of hereditary habits and associations. Louis XVIII., however, had shown himself more disposed to amalgamate with new interests and ideas than his brother and successor, the Count D'Artois. He was less prejudiced, and better informed, than Charles, but Jesuitical—not so direct and sincere—and thought the end justified the means. He was a timid prince, who, having experienced a long term of adversity, did not for the third time, wish to expose himself to its bitterness, by hazardous experiments on the patience of his subjects. Though too much of a royalist to admit that the throne had been vacant during his absence of twenty-five years, or to accept a constitutional charter from the French, he vouchsafed to bestow one upon them, which contained many provisions, not less liberal and enlightened than those tendered to Louis XVI. by the Constituent Assembly. He often checked the ultra zeal of his emigrant advisers, and was dragged onward, rather than willingly participated in their retrograding schemes. Still his government did not acquire stability. It never won the confidence of the French people. They were internally prosperous, suffered under no physical calamity, but were politically discontented. Their pride was hurt, their fears kept awake. A hostile family had been imposed upon them. All that had been done in its inglorious exile was known to be held as a crime, for which France was bound to repent—to ask pardon. The patriotic principles of 1799 were contemned, the military glories of the Republic and of the empire were not acknowledged; and the multitudinous landed interest, which had grown up on the confiscated domains of the church and noblesse, were felt to be endangered. Hence the disquietudes and collisions that followed the restoration of Louis, and which impelled his government into the adoption of unconstitutional stretches of authority, hardly less violent than those that marked the course of his successor. Sometimes the press was controlled, by the imposition of a censorship; sometimes the elections for deputies were arbitrarily interfered with; and sometimes the peerage was suddenly augmented, to carry obnoxious measures.*

The death of the king, in 1824, had no tendency to allay apprehensions, or produce greater harmony between the ruler and the ruled. Louis had affected to pursue a middle course; his successor had no such ambition. Charles was a bold, bigoted man: unlike his brother, he was a sincere catholic. He hated the revolution, and all its fruits, and never disguised his hatred. The royalists knew they could depend on his firmness, and were not slow to avail themselves of his support.

In the first year of his reign, the rights of the electors were openly violated by the prefects: the result was an overwhelming ministerial majority, which adopted a measure to extend the duration of the chamber of deputies to seven years, and its renewal in totality, instead of annually, by one-fifth. Next followed a law to indemnify the emigrants. Thirty millions of rentes, in the Three per cent. were assigned for this purpose, representing, at the current price of 75 of that stock, a capital of 30,000,000*l*. An alteration in the law of property, favourable in certain cases, to its entailment, was carried. In 1827 Villèle ventured on the bold measure of disbanding the national guard of Paris, because it had openly expressed satisfaction at the defeat of a restrictive law of the press. He next took the decisive step, apparently without pressing necessity, of dissolving the chamber of deputies. This was fatal to his ministry, by affording an opportunity to all his opponents to display their hostility. Many of the royalists were offended by his plan for the reduction of the interest of the debt, his augmentations of the peerage, and his refusals to support their extreme policy; while, on the other hand, the liberals were alienated by the anti-revolutionary tendency of his government. The two parties coalesced to overthrow his administration; they jointly selected candidates, whom they supported, during the general election, with their united strength, and everywhere the minister's friends were defeated.

M. de Villèle, unable to withstand the coalition, did not wait the assembling of the chambers, but resigned January 5, 1828. The Martignac ministry followed, consisting of many of the colleagues of Villèle, but more inclined than that minister towards constitutional principles. It abolished the discretionary power of re-establishing the censorship of the press, and abrogated the hateful law of tendency as respected the journals. It also fortified the elective rights of the nation, by securing the purity of the electoral lists, against the frauds of the local authorities; and finally issued an ordinance on education, that relieved society from the encroachments of the Jesuits, and the alarm of clerical domination. These advances towards liberalism seem to have alarmed the king, and he dismissed his responsible advisers.

In August, 1829, Charles took a step which his predecessor had never ventured upon, and that was, to appoint a ministry, consisting wholly of royalists. At the head of this ministry was prince de Polignac, a devoted Bourbonite, and bigoted catholic. During the exile of the Bourbons, the prince had engaged in various wild schemes for their restoration, and was implicated, along with M. D'Haussez—another of the new ministers—in the conspiracy of Georges, for the assassination of Buonaparte. Bourmont, appointed the new minister of war, had been a Vendean chief, and the last that submitted: he had, however, joined Napoleon on his return from Elba, but deserted him on the eve of the battle of Waterloo; and gave the fatal evidence, on the trial of marshal Ney, that determined the fate of that gallant soldier. The other ministers were royalist advocates, or emigrants, who had fought in the army of the prince of Condé.

* To carry, in 1818, the law of election, 67 peers were created at once; in 1823—the year of intervention in Spanish affairs—27 peers were made by M. de Villèle; and in 1827, the same minister created 76 more, to recover the royalist majority, which had been lost through the creations of M. Decazes, in 1819.

The appointment of the Polignac ministry left no doubt of the designs of the court, and preparations were made to counteract them. An association was formed in Brittany to resist the payment of taxes, and subscriptions were set on foot to indemnify those who might suffer in resisting the levy of imposts. The journals were mostly on the liberal side; they denounced, with almost one accord, the new ministry, and endeavoured, by spirited appeals to the people, and even to the French military, to rouse them to a sense of the threatened danger to the public liberties. The royalists were not idle, and also had recourse to the press, either to allay popular apprehension, or to vindicate their intended policy. In the Moniteur appeared a manifesto from prince Polignac, in which he unreservedly disclaimed all the rumoured projects for destroying the Charter; for gaining a majority in the chamber of deputies, by an unconstitutional addition of aristocratic members; for calling in foreign armies to overawe the French people; and for raising forces by royal ordinances. On the other hand, a royalist publication was put forth, describing with great ability the existing crisis, and recommending to the prince almost the precise course he ultimately adopted. It contended that France had no real evil to complain of; all the abuses of her institutions had been swept away by the revolution; notwithstanding she was in a state of constant agitation; that this agitation arose from the political incongruity of a monarchy, unsupported by privileged orders; that nothing like it existed in England, where the aristocracy were predominant through their wealth and parliamentary influence. France was essentially democratic; its peerage existed in name only, and its ecclesiastical hierarchy the same; there was no gradation of classes; hardly any inequality of property; no corps of sinecurists, or well-paid placemen: the monarch was insulated, and without support. In conclusion, the writer recommended the abrogation of the Charter, and the establishment of a dictatorship, in lieu of the constitutional system.*

M. Cotta described the juncture correctly; his premises were true; his conclusions false and pernicious. He reasoned like a one-sided partisan, who had neither learnt nor unlearned by the events of the last forty years; who thought that the king, not the people, was the state. Most truly he stated that the experience of the last fifteen years had shown that France could not continue in her present state, but her difficulties admitted of a double solution—either the will of the prince or the nation must be paramount. The question at issue was, whether the royal pleasure or the national desires should succumb? whether the prejudices of the Bourbons or the reason of France should triumph? whether Charles should be indulged in his love of a superstitious priesthood, privileged orders, tithes, feudal services, and provincial administrations; or the French, in their preference of representative institutions, as a better guarantee than the uncertain will of an individual, of civil liberty, equality of rights, social honours, and possessions. M. Cottu was for humouring the monarch; the people were for humouring themselves. Though erroneous in reasoning, and dangerous in application, the advice of the councillor of the Cour Royale found favour in England; and the leading journal of a great political party encouraged the French royalists to persevere in the perilous course on which it appears they had determined to venture.*

The chambers were opened by the king. March 2nd, in a speech of ominous import. "If culpable manœuvres," said Charles, "should raise up against my government obstacles which I do not wish to foresee, I shall find the power of surmounting them, in my resolution to maintain the public peace, in my just confidence in Frenchmen, and in the love which they have always shown to their kings." The deputies, in their address, expressed their want of confidence in the government; and Charles replied, that his "intentions were immutable." As a decided majority of the deputies were against the ministry, no alternative remained but their dismissal, or a dissolution of the chamber. The king decided on the latter, trusting that by a vigorous exertion of government influence over the electoral colleges, to obtain a majority in the next chamber. He was disappointed, as might have been anticipated, from the circumstances under which he appealed to the public opinion. He next seems to have taken the resolution of governing without the chambers; and out came, on the 26th July, the famous ordinances, by which the constitution was swept away, and the Charter, as some with more zeal than foresight had recommended, thrown to the winds.

The events of the memorable three days that followed are detailed in the Chronicle. On Monday the ordinances appeared in the Moniteur; on Tuesday the people murmured; on Wednesday they took up arms—fought, and bled; on Thursday they triumphed over armed oppression; and on Friday the elder branch of the Bourbons had ceased to reign. Europe stood aghast at these marvellous occurrences—at the insatiation of the king, and the matchless heroism of the people. In ten days they had hurled a tyrant from his throne, and elected, in his stead, a constitutional sovereign, bound by conditions fixed by the national representatives. These sudden vicissitudes—this mighty convulsion, shook every throne. Within a month after, Belgium became the scene of a popular revolution hardly less astonishing. The shock was felt throughout Germany, in Italy, and Poland, and even in England, as we shall now proceed to indicate.

William IV., on his accession, found the WELLINGTON MINISTRY in power, and expressed no dissatisfaction with their measures or intention of removing them. But the administration was weak—it was unsupported by the anti-catholic section of the Tories, and depended for continuance in

* After an approving notice of M. Cottu's book, the Quarterly Review, lxxv. 239, said,—“We, therefore, hope and trust that the king of France and his present ministers may succeed, if such be their object, in establishing a censorship on the press, and likewise in acquiring so decided a preponderance in the chamber of deputies, that its existence as an independent body, capable of bearing the monarchy, as it has recently done, shall be no longer recognised. This, we own, will be a virtual abolition of the Charter.” Further on they say,—“We think it is hardly possible to doubt that, unless the existing government adopts, and succeeds in carrying into effect, some very decisive measures in the course of the present year, there will ensue another burst of convulsion, and Napoleon has left no saying of more indisputable truth behind him, than that a revolution in France is a revolution in Europe.” This was in May, two months before the July revolution.

authority, on the voluntary co-operation of the opposition, with whom it was not in hearty accordance on most questions of foreign and domestic policy. The death of George IV. and the occurrences of the parliamentary session that preceded it, increased the divergence between the minister and his auxiliaries, and essentially changed the political landscape. It was evident that the premier was not disposed to advance much further with his whig allies, while the latter pressed upon him the alternative of unpopularity or an unfaltering progression in his reformatory course. The country was in difficulties, and sir James Graham truly urged that it was only in moments of distress that useful purposes could be effected. Acting on this principle, the baronet made motions supported by eloquent speeches for return of the salaries and emoluments of privy councillors,* for the salaries and fees of consuls, and for returns of the expenses of diplomatic missions; all which were negatived by large majorities. Two motions of lord John Russell for parliamentary reform shared a like fate. Sir Robert Peel and sir Harry Inglis contended that legislative reform was not required; Mr. Horace Twiss and sir George Murray, not so sanguine in their optimism, did not hold precisely the same faith, but held that giving representatives to Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham, would be a violent proceeding. These ministerial negatives evinced that the fund of liberalism in the administration was spent; that further popular concessions were not to be expected, and the whigs availed themselves of the opportunity afforded by the commencement of a new reign and consequent dissolution of parliament to dissolve the ducal alliance, and withdraw from the support of a government in which they had never officially participated.

This action was not the only disadvantage with which the ministry had to grapple. The experience and abilities of its chief were deemed unequal to the task of civil government; and his Catholic Relief Act and some other measures were known to have been compulsory, not voluntary concessions. Hence, it lacked the national confidence, and failed to reap thanks or gratitude for laudable acts. Moreover, all tories were in discredit by the progress of popular information. For twenty years the abuses of public institutions, of public offices, of chartered companies, in charitable foundations, in the management of the public revenue, and crown revenues, had been a constant subject of exposure and animadversion by Mr. Brougham, Mr. Creevy, Lord Cochrane, Sir H. Barnell, Mr. Hume, Mr. Cobbett, and others. It was discovered and demonstrated that the government had failed in its legitimate purposes; that it had been carried on more for the benefit of the administrators than the community; that public services were over or unequally or inadequately remunerated; that public money was squandered in the maintenance of useless sinecures and undeserved pensions; and that peers, and commoners, their relatives, dependents, and connexions alike abetted, as they participated in the general corruption. Even the ministry of the duke of Wellington had been found not free from the opprobrium of his predecessors. Official patronage was abused, and cabinet ministers were found creating offices and putting their sons into them, and then abolishing the offices and retaining the compensation-pensions.†

add out, some old and others recent, that parliament was dissolved July 24. The popular voice throughout the United Kingdom was against the prime minister; by the whigs he was deserted, and the violent of his own party, who alleged they had been betrayed, were bitterly hostile to him. To add to his difficulties, almost before the elections began, came the thunder-clap of the insurrection in Paris; and, shortly after a second peal, hardly less astounding, from Brussels. The nation was intoxicated with joy at these triumphs over oppression. All the horrors left by the first French revolution were effaced by the success and magnanimity of the second; even the property-classes became enamoured of popular commotions, and all who did not share in the gladness inspired by passing events, incurred dislike—almost execration. The minister duke became especially obnoxious, because he was suspected, though unjustly, of having been privy to the plot and elevation of prince Polignac, and the rumour told effectively against him at the elections. His colleagues were generally shunned; in the counties and populous boroughs they had no chance; even the universities turned their backs upon them as apostates to torism; they could hardly find seats even in the nomination boroughs. The state of national feeling is shown by the return of Mr. Brougham for Yorkshire, and Mr. Hume for Middlesex; for it was a saying in the days of Charles James Fox, that “these two counties rule all England.”*

The new parliament met November 2nd, and was opened by an unpopular royal speech. It regretted the state of affairs in the Low Countries; lamented the destruction of machinery, and the recent fires occasioned by incendiaries, and intimated a determination to punish outrage, disorder, and sedition. It said nothing about parliamentary or other reforms, which was generally expected, and public disappointment was aggravated by the declaration of the prime minister. Sensible, from the results of the elections, that the end of his ministerial career was approaching, he seemed disposed to hasten it by his own violence, and, in the discussion on the address, boldly affirmed that reform was unnecessary, and that while he continued at the head of the government no measure of that character should be introduced. In the existing state of political feeling, the effect was electric, and in the metropolis the excitement was such that a complimentary visit, intended to be paid in the city, on lord mayor's-day, by their majesties, was postponed, from an apprehension of popular commotion. All that had been previously surmised of the duke's unfitness for civil government seemed orally confirmed by himself, and, on the 15th, he was formally deposed, in the accustomed way, by a majority of the house of commons voting against him. Next day brought the welcome tidings of his resignation.

The resignation of the Wellington ministry terminated the executive supremacy of the Tories. Divisions among themselves, and reluctant and unavoidable concessions to the popular demands, had portended, during the last thirteen years, the decline of their exclusive authority. With very short intermissions, they had exercised the government of the country since the accession of George the Third; during that long term every branch of administration had become saturated with their maxims and adherents; and nothing, save a concurrence of favourable circumstances, and a necessity palpable and urgent, would have been adequate to dislodge a power so firmly rooted and widely ramified. But public institutions imperiously required the corrective of new principles. The dilapidating effects of time and neglect had become apparent in the primary, as well as secondary departments of administration. Inequalities and abuses were not more rare in the church and public offices than in the courts of law and great corporations of the kingdom. Under a pertinacious system of non-inquiry and non-reform, the gangrene had spread through the entire frame, and a new anatomy of parts, not less than new blood, had become essential to a perfect regeneration of the body politic.

The most curious part of the system was unquestionably the representative. Engrossed by the more pressing dangers of popery and arbitrary power, this had been left untouched at the revolution of 1688. Time had augmented its deformities, and shown more glaringly the disavowance of property and intelligence from political power and responsibility; till at length it had degenerated into a mere mockery, obvious to the minds of all men by the ludicrous contrast of Old Sarum and Clotton with representatives—Birmingham and Manchester without a voice. By nomination-boroughs, by close corporations, and by the peculiarities of the county franchise, only one interest was substantially incorporated in the legislature. Land was omnipotent; commerce, manufactures, shipping; all that constituted the pride, distinction, and glory of the realm, were dumb, or only partially and stealthily heard, like something guilty or illegitimate, from a few stray organs, or the less recognised channels of the public press, and popular assemblages in the open air. An oligarchy ruled, and it is needless to say that the laws it made, the measures it supported, and those it frustrated, savoured of the character, the prejudices, and interests of the land-owners.

No problem in Euclid had been better demonstrated than the iniquities of parliamentary elections and representation. They had ceased to be reasoned upon, and their defence had become a mere thesis for wits and rhetoricians to display their ingenious sophistry. Just half a century had elapsed since reform was on the point of being achieved by a national movement, arrested only by the No Popery riots of Lord George Gordon. It was again postponed till the tempest of the French revolution had swept by, but it was never abandoned; it was only laid aside as a thing well known—its value appreciated, but, like something sacred, it was kept back till a period of tranquillity, or till favourable circumstances, like those indicated above, insured for it a triumphant reception. It had always been looked upon, by patriotic and enlightened men, not blinded by selfishness, ambition, or morbid refinement, as the ark, the wholesome corrective of the constitution; and sir George Savile, Wyvile, William Pitt, Charles Grey, sir Francis Burdett, major Cartwright, Blande, Lambton, and lord John Russell, are some of the distinguished names who successively took charge of the state ship, till it was finally accepted and applied by a beneficent and puissant monarch.

Besides the concurring and favourable circumstances arising from the co-operation of king, ministers, and people, in one direction, animated and impelled in their course by the excitement of the continental revolutions; there were others that helped to weaken opposition to constitutional changes, while, at the same time, they produced a more perfect unanimity and force among those classes who had the wish and the power to effect them. These were the total absence, or at least abeyance, of the wild and impracticable theories of social and political reform, which had agitated the country during the five years subsequent to the peace. Neither property, nor the church, nor the constitution, was felt to be endangered by the progress of reform.

under its present auspices. The political effervescence that prevailed from 1816 to 1821 had entirely subsided; the advocates of universal suffrage and annual parliaments had met with so little encouragement that they had ceased to petition the legislature; and the course was now free to the advancement of more moderate and feasible claims, supported by the intelligence and propriety of the kingdom.*

The ministry of earl Grey was formed in November, 1830. Public opinion imperatively marshalled the way, and fortunately there was no wish, certainly no intention, of diverging into any bye-path. Those members of the cabinet who had not, like the head of the government, always been reformers, were converted, or acquiesced under the pressure of existing circumstances. The king himself consented to the introduction of a measure of reform; on this condition office had been accepted by his majesty's new advisers, who declared, immediately on taking the reins of power, the terms of their intended administration to be peace abroad, reform and retrenchment at home.

These pledges the whigs faithfully redeemed, in a spirit of wisdom, firmness, and patriotism. As respects their first and greatest measure, that of PARLIAMENTARY REFORM, on which the heart of the nation was fixed, they might have tried illusive arts—have sought delay—attempted, and perhaps temporarily succeeded, in palming on the community a much less efficient measure than that they actually introduced and triumphantly consummated. But it would have been no resting-place; this they foresaw, and wisely shunned both delusion and procrastination. They applied themselves directly to the removal of the public malady, which they correctly understood, grappled with it, and like bold and skilful physicians, cut out the cancer that had for ages preyed on the vitals of the constitution, and took all the precautions they could, commensurate with public intelligence and their own power, to guard against its re-production.

Their first aim was to augment popular control, conformably to the altered disposition in society of wealth and knowledge, and by divesting the government of its irresponsible action, render the oligarchical interests, heretofore predominant in the state, subordinate to those of the common weal. In pursuit of this organic change, they proceeded neither wildly, rashly, nor selfishly. No greater disturbance was given to existing institutions; no greater violence committed on existing interests, than was essential to the general security; by which means the alarms of the timid were allayed, and the demands of the moderate and rational satisfied. They sought to reform within, not without, the pale of the constitution. In this spirit the ballot, which was included in the first draft of the reform bill, was rejected as extraneous, and inapplicable to the evils complained of—which were the nomination boroughs—non-representation of the large towns—inequalities in the elective franchise—and the delay, expense, and corruption of elections.†

* So completely out of heart and hope were the ultra-radicals that parliament would reform itself, that of late years they had ceased to petition for it. In the year 1821 nineteen petitions were presented in favour of reform; in the year 1822 the number was reduced to twelve; in the year 1823 the number was twenty-nine; in the year 1824 there was no petition at all in favour of reform. The same was the case in the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1829. In the session of 1828 there were fourteen.—(Mr. Croker's Speech, House of Commons, March 1, 1831.)

† The preparation of the first draft of the Reform Bill was intrusted by earl Grey to lord Durham, who was assisted by the advice of three of his colleagues, lord John Russell, sir James Graham, and lord Duncannon.—(Earl Durham's Speech, Gateshead, October 23, 1832.)

That the scheme of the Reform Ministers was bold and honest, as well as discreet; that it was proportioned to the emergency; or, if defective, that they shared its errors, in common with the people, is shown by the well-known fact, that its first introduction was hailed with one unanimous burst from reformers of all classes, of surprise, gratitude, and thankfulness; and that almost the entire nation seemed ready, at one period of its jeopardy, to peril its existence in the carrying of "the bill," the whole bill, and nothing but the bill;" while on the other hand, the Tories, those whose career of misrule it was intended to arrest, and for ever foreclose, stood aghast at its boldness—its uprooting, subversive reality; and, forgetting their divisions, they at once united, as against a common enemy that threatened now and for ever their extinction in name, authority, and spoliative rapacity.

Under such political aspects was the REFORM BILL introduced and accepted by the community. It was first brought forward in the house of commons, by lord John Russell, March 1st, 1831. So great had been the popular excitement pending the general election of the preceding year, that the second reading was carried by a majority of ONE, in a parliament chosen under the auspices of the Wellington administration. But on the 20th April, general Gascoigne carried his amendment on the clause of the ministerial proposition, reducing the numbers of the house by a majority of eight.

Two days after, the parliament was dissolved in a speech, in which the king stated, that the appeal about to be made to the people had been resolved upon, expressly with the view of ascertaining their sense as to the proposed alteration in the representation. The general election took place in May, and the new parliament met on the 14th June. On the 24th, the second Reform Bill was introduced; and on the 4th of July, after a debate of three nights, the second reading was carried by a majority of 136; the motion having been supported by 367 members, and opposed by 231. At half-past six on the morning of the 8th October, after a debate of five nights, this bill was thrown out, on the second reading in the Lords, by a majority of 199 to 158. On the 20th, parliament was prorogued, and was not again called together till the 6th December. The year, however, which had already been so busy and eventful, did not close till the great measure, in the discussion of which so much of it had been spent, was again before the legislature.

The third Reform Bill was introduced into the Commons on the 12th December, and read a second time by a majority of exactly two to one, on the 17th. Having, however, been detained nearly two months in committee, it did not leave the Commons till the 19th March, 1832, when the third reading was carried by a majority of 355 to 239. At seven o'clock on the morning of the 14th April, after a debate of four days, it was read a second time in the house of lords, and carried by a majority of 9, the numbers being 184 in its favour, and 175 against it. On the 7th May, however, the day on which parliament re-assembled after the Easter recess, the motion proposed by lord Lyndhurst—to postpone the consideration of the disfranchising clauses of the bill till the enfranchising clauses had been discussed—was carried against ministers, by a majority of 151 to 116. As this was considered the first of a series of obstructions, dexterously intended by the learned lord to delay and mutilate, if not destroy the national scheme, the ministers adopted at the instant a firm and resolute course. On the 9th, earl Grey announced in the lords, and viscount Althorp in the commons, that ministers had resigned. A week of terrific agitation followed; but on this it is unnecessary to dwell, as it must still be fresh in general recollection, and is fully described in the Chronicle.*

It may be here proper to observe, that from the first meeting of parliament the general impression had been, that ministers were in possession of the royal assent to an augmentation of the peerage, in case they could not otherwise carry the bill through the upper house. It now appeared such assent had neither been obtained nor sought, and in consequence, the popular disappointment was great, though premature, and in part unreasonable. Ministers had resolved not to transgress the limits of the constitution, nor even to resort to the extreme measure which the constitution allowed, without urgent and unavoidable necessity.

After their resignation, the king sent for lord Lyndhurst, who communicated with the duke of Wellington and sir Robert Peel. Although his majesty sought new councillors, it is due to his memory distinctly to record, that he sought them solely with the view of surmounting, with less violence, the obstacle that had arisen in the way of reform; but with an unflinching determination that "an extensive reform" should be effected. Under this limitation lord Lyndhurst received his commission. The duke of Wellington, from motives of loyalty, as he himself explained them,* and in chivalrous defiance of his recent anti-reform declaration, appeared disposed to lend himself to the royal emergency; but sir Robert Peel was more untractable. He had strenuously opposed the reform bill from its first introduction: he had no hope of modifying the bill to his own satisfaction, so as to meet the approval of the existing majority of the commons against him; therefore, out of regard to his own consistency, he declined, though tempted with the premiership, to co-operate with the duke in any attempt to form a ministry on the basis the king had prescribed. Of course the design of a new administration was given up, and the former ministers recalled.

On the 18th of May, earl Grey intimated that himself and colleagues were again in office. He also intimated that he had returned to power on the condition, and with an assurance from the king, that, so far as it depended on his majesty, his co-operative aid to carry the reform bill should not be wanting. Both the king and his ministers had manifested a laudable reluctance to resort to the extreme measure of a sudden and enormous addition to the peerage; but all other means the constitution pointed out had been tried and found insufficient. The people had been appealed to by a dissolution of parliament; a large majority of their representatives had passed the bill, the king was favourable to it, an attempt to form an anti-reform ministry had miscarried; only one obdurate branch of the legislature withstood the aggregate will: therefore now was the juncture, now was the necessity, in order to carry on the government of the country, when the prerogative of the crown ought and might be legitimately called into action. Without this exercise of the regal power, which, like Goliath's sword ought never to be brought forward, save on great and needful occasion, the constitution would have been in abeyance; the necessary business of the executive impeded; and the internal peace of the empire endangered. In lieu of a government of king, lords, and commons, it would have degenerated into a government of lords alone, in defiance of the two other estates of the realm, and the loudly, and almost unanimously-expressed voice of the people.

The king's resolve having become known, its execution was rendered unnecessary. Rather than have their lustre diminished, and collective power diluted by an addition of about one hundred to their number, the refractory peers, in obedience to the royal wish, conveyed to them in a circular,* absented themselves from the house, and the reform bill was carried, in silence and solitude, through its remaining stages, encountering a merely formal opposition. On the 4th June it was read a third time and passed by a majority of 106 to 22. On the 7th, it received the royal assent. The Scotch and Irish Bills and the Boundaries Bill were, in like manner, soon after enacted into laws. On the 16th August the parliament was prorogued, and did not again meet. It was dissolved on the 3d December; and the remainder of that month was occupied in the first general election under the new system of representation.

As the changes effected by the reform acts, and the character of the first parliament elected under them have been described, in their chronological place,† we shall here only summarily indicate the constitutional progress of the government, and its successive epochs, from the commencement of the present history, and already more fully noticed in our antecedent prefatory discourses, down to the passing of the great parliamentary charter of the Reform Ministry.

The devolution and expansion of political power have been from the king to the people. Divesting ourselves of the illusions of antiquity, that would assume a perfection of civil polity incompatible with an untutored age, it is impossible to conceal that the English government, for a long period, was a simple despotism, occasionally and irregularly limited in the exercise, by the interference of the nobility and clergy. The first decided and regular approach to constitutional rule was the regal grant of Magna Charta. It defined the immunities of the crown and aristocracy, and recognized, by a public instrument that could always be appealed to, general principles of equity, before unknown or unpractised; and though limited in the first instance in their application to the privileged orders, by whom they had been sanctioned and obtained, they came to be gradually applied to other classes, and ultimately to the entire community by whom they were claimed.

The civil wars of the commonwealth do not appear to have achieved any abiding result for the people. The commons had risen into affluence and intelligence; they were powerful enough to wage a successful war against the monarch, depose him, and set him aside, along with the church and house of lords; but owing to divisions and theological disputes among themselves, or rather, perhaps, to the political inexperience that rashly led them to make greater changes than could be safely attempted or permanently maintained, they failed to circumscribe the prerogatives against which they had rebelled, by new and stable constitutional barriers. In consequence of this abortive issue the Restoration was dexterously, and almost, under the circumstances, necessarily effected without conditions; the old arbitrary powers of the crown remained, and the exercise of them was only for a time checked through the salutary terror impressed on the executive by a recent and successful example of popular resistance.

By the revolution of 1688, absolutism, and even the pretensions to it, were for ever laid prostrate. William III. was the elected king of the nation; his prerogatives were strictly defined by the Bill of Rights, and the practice of the constitution was more nearly assimilated to the theory. As the aristocratic order, lay and ecclesiastical, had by their vigorous and well-concerted exertions chiefly effected the change of dynasty, they naturally claimed, and certainly appropriated its chief and immediate benefits. In lieu of regal, the government became parliamentary; or, in consequence of the small number among whom parliamentary power was divided, oligarchical. The Middle Classes had continued to increase in social importance, but were still restricted to the exercise of an indirect influence on public affairs through the medium of the Press and their riches, aided by a fragment of representation in the house of commons. The narrow basis of the government gave a narrow direction to the objects of state policy. National interests were disregarded or misunderstood, and the interests of the two factions, into which the Oligarchy was divided, were chiefly considered. Domestic abuses that constituted their strength and profit were allowed to accumulate, or if disturbed it was only for party purposes, which answered, they were again left to increase and multiply. Abroad a policy was pursued hurtful and expensive to the people. Its leading features were the ambition or cupidity of colonial acquisitions that were burdensome or embarrassing to the nation; continental wars and entangling alliances for trifling, contradictory, or reprehensible objects; the perpetuation of national rivalries and antipathies; the maintenance of an imaginary balance of power among the European states; the dictation of the order of succession to foreign thrones, and the form of their internal administration. Questions of closer national interest, of commerce, navigation, and industrial prosperity were only incidentally noticed, and inadequately appreciated. External, not internal, policy was the primary object of statesmen, the grand topic of parliamentary eloquence and intrigue, the pivot upon which the strength or weakness, the permanence or dissolution of a whig or tory administration revolved.*

* The Parliamentary Debates, of which we have now such a copious and authentic record, offer an ample field for culling the political notions—for amidst the animosities and confusion of party they had rarely the constancy or generalization of principles—of the leading statesmen of the Georgian era. In debating the commercial treaty with France in 1786, Mr. Fox argued that "France was the natural political enemy of Great Britain"—(Foreign Quarterly Review, xxxvii. 171). The Corinthian politicians were more conversant with the philippics of Demosthenes or the orations of Cicero, than with the writings of Mr. Locke, Stewart, Hume, or Adam Smith. Mr. Pitt's ideas on an important question of domestic polity afford a singular contrast to prevailing sentiments (see Feb. 12. 1796). As parliament, not the court, was the arena on which the prize of government was contended for, ability to shine in debate was chiefly cultivated. It drew forth a brilliant constellation of rhetoricians—cadets of noble families, lawyers, and literary adventurers—whose chief accomplishment in statesmanship was oratory. "From the time" (says the Edinburgh Review, cxxxvii. 159) "of Charles II. down to our own days, a different species of talent, parliamentary talent, has been the most valuable of all the qualifications of an English statesman. It has stood in the place of all other acquisitions. It has covered ignorance, weakness, rashness, the most fatal mal-administration. A great negotiator is nothing when compared with a great debater, and a minister who can make a successful speech need trouble himself little about an unsuccessful expedition. This is the talent that has made judges without law, and diplomatists without French,—which has sent to the admiralty men who did not know the stern of a ship from her bowsprit, and to the India board men who did not know the difference between a rupee and a pagoda,—which made a foreign secretary of Mr. Pitt, who, as George II. said, had never opened Vattel, and which was very near making a chancellor of the exchequer of Mr. Sheridan, who could not work a sum in long division." It did make a chancellor of the exchequer of Mr. Canning, hardly a less miracle than Sheridan's promotion would have been. But the age of tropes has yielded to the age of utility! Sheridan was the last example in the senate, and Erskine, who was a good specimen in English, of Irish eloquence, the last at the bar,

The general Peace gave a new direction to legislation. By the fortunate issue of the struggle against Napoleon's ambition the tories became so firmly rooted in authority that the whigs gave up all hope of supplanting them, and, leaving the barren pursuit of power, they directed attention to commercial, educational, financial, legal, and juridical ameliorations. Social questions slowly acquired an interest beyond that of political conflicts. In this new field a knowledge of the principles of science was more important than cleverness in debate. The style of parliamentary oratory necessarily underwent a contemporary change—became less ornamental and figurative—more logical and statistical—and the new direction given to it has received a further impulse from the great but prosaic interests called into legislative existence by the Reform Acts,—the last and most triumphant epoch in the progress of the British constitution.

Statesmen, like philosophers, must be judged by the standard of their own time, not by that of a future age. For the period, and under the circumstances, the Reform Bill was a just, comprehensive, and energetic conception. For names it substituted realities; for prescriptive rights that had become hurtful or dead, it created living interests. All may have not been made partakers of its benefits, but all have been made easily and equally eligible to them: there is no interdict. Its leading feature is a circumscription of aristocratic power, which had become degenerate, by its transfusion into the democracy, which had risen into competence and relative supremacy. Legislative authority is now vested in the nation, and the nation, when it thinks fit, can constitutionally exercise it. The difference in the action of Public Opinion, before and after the Reform Bill, is great and distinctive. It was always potent; it triumphed over the Stuarts; at the Orange revolution of 1688 it was present; it often controlled the factions under the Georges, and even succeeded in returning a reform parliament under a Wellington ministry. But its impulses were irregular; too sudden or dilatory; often violent or even revolutionary; rarely deliberative, and always illegitimate. These defects have been remedied by the parliamentary charter, which has established a safe and recognized channel for the conveyance of the public sentiment. No interest is now—though perhaps not in just proportion—without its representative organ. In tranquil times, in the absence of gross abuse, or misgovernment, these organs may be mute, relaxed, and quiescent: they may be like river-beds in summer, empty, dry, and inert; but let oppression stalk forth, or imbecility be apparent in rulers, and their latent powers become manifest, they are instantly strung, and peal with a warning voice that no minister, however reckless and unprincipled, would dare to disregard.

These different powers of the constitution, under different circumstances, will give an oscillating ascendancy to political parties. In periods of prosperity, when men are disposed to contentment under the established order, the prevailing tendency will be to Conservatism; in periods of distress or misrule to Whiggism, or, according to the intensity of the popular orgasm, to Radicalism. In the absence of any public emergency, the merit as well as the necessity of private sacrifices is diminished; and those not influenced by high principles follow their interests or inclination. It will thus happen that the Tories, in ordinary times, will gather strength in the towns, where the mass of the constituency has become indifferent to the exercise of the elective franchise, as well as in the counties, where their influence must always be great from territorial possessions, local association, and the indisposition to change peculiar to the rural classes. Against the temporary growth of the authority of their opponents, the Whigs, in framing the Reform Bill, took no selfish precautions. They seem, indeed, to have favoured it; and some of the alterations admitted into the original scheme experience soon showed not to be improvements. The maintenance of the full number of 658 members, and the very considerable increase in the county representation, at the expense of the boroughs, were decidedly in favour of the Tories. The tax and rate-paying clauses operate in the same direction. The last in particular, in the absence of political excitement, effect an extensive disfranchisement of their supporters; while the Conservatives continue undiminished or are augmented by defections from their ranks. Ministers, however, are not to blame for the tenant-at-will clause; they opposed that interpolation, which was carried against them by a section of Radicals, headed by Mr. Hume, joining the Tories.

Notwithstanding the points in favour of the Tories, there is little likelihood of their obtaining a permanent ascendancy. It can only happen when no reforms are needed, or the people are indifferent to them, or the public mind is not agreed or matured on their expediency, that the torpor of conservatism can overpower the nation. In all other cases the progressive principle will be in action; nor is there any power remaining, either in the crown or the house of lords, long to resist its onward movement. Lord Coke said, "that seldom or ever any good measure which had once been entered on the Journals, though it miscarried at first, was wholly lost to the nation." If this were true under the old system, it is much more likely to be realized under the new. But half a century or so, as in the case of the Test and Corporation Acts, African Slave Bill, or the Catholic Relief Bill, is too long to wait for just and sound legislation; and it would certainly now be a hazardous experiment on the national patience for the lords to delay five in lieu of fifty years public measures carried by a large majority of the commons, supported by the population of the metropolis, the municipal towns, and the present enlarged constituency.

The chief excellence of the new representation is that we have tried to explain, namely, its alternate actions, by which rest as well as efficient expression is given to the public sentiment. It is likely future changes will be peaceably as well as deliberately and constitutionally effected. The new machinery telegraphs all the great national impulses, and seems so contrived as safely to bear, without snapping, any strain to which it may be subjected by the outward pressure. One of its greatest and most easily remedied defects is, that its movements are too slow, by which the communication of feeling between the representative and constituent bodies may be too long suspended. Seven years are too protracted a term for the natural duration of parliament. There is less reason for this now that general elections have been rendered so quiet, economical, and expeditious. A shorter period is demanded from the altered state of society—its increased intellectual activity through the agency of the press and popular discussion, by which changes of opinion are constantly being effected with railroad despatch, and requiring to be communicated with corresponding celerity and force to the legislature.

Apart from the danger of disaversion of feeling between the people and parliament, from its septennial duration, the new representation, on its first trial may be pronounced to have been successful. It fully answered the most trying test of social institutions, that of practical usefulness in accordance with the national sentiment. As might be expected, the first Reformed Parliament consisted of a vast majority of those by whom it had been created, and was composed of two-thirds whigs, and the remainder in about equal portions of Tories and radicals.* It began its labours by adopting salutary regulations for improving and facilitating the modes of transacting parliamentary business.† A session of splendid legislation followed, unsurpassed in justice, utility, and practical wisdom by that of any representative assembly on record. There was a manifest indisposition to entertain questions involving further organic changes, especially as those under which the commons itself had assembled remained untried; but all the great topics on which public opinion had been expressed and matured were resolutely grappled with, elaborately discussed, and satisfactorily adjusted. As a summary of the important labours of this year has been given in another place, it is sufficient to refer to them.‡ Ireland, its internal peace and ecclesiastical establishment; the East India Company, the renewal of its charter, the opening of its exclusive trade with China, and the future government of the vast population of Hindostan; the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England, and the connexion of its immunities with the state of banking and the currency; and lastly, the abolition of colonial slavery, with a compensatory grant to the West India proprietary, formed engrossing subjects of parliamentary debate and enactment.

The FOREIGN POLICY of the empire formed an additional subject of interest and discussion. Almost for the first time on record, England and France acted in concert without jealousy or mistrust. Both nations had recently and almost contemporaneously undergone great internal changes; but France, by the election of Louis Philippe, the abolition of the hereditary Peerage, the establishment of popular education, and the doubling of her elective constituency, had outstript England in the race of social improvement and constitutional innovation. In the foreign policy of the two kingdoms there was no divarication; of both the aim was the maintenance of peace among nations; but constitutional themselves, they naturally felt an interest in promoting the establishment of constitutional power in other countries. Acting on this principle the claims of Don Pedro in favour of his daughter were preferred to those of Don Miguel in Portugal; and those of the queen-regent in behalf of her infant by Ferdinand VII. to those of his brother Don Carlos in Spain; but neither government excited the fears of other states by direct interference in behalf of Isabella II. of Spain, or Donna Maria of Portugal.§ A subject of nearer and deeper interest than the fratricidal contests in the Peninsula was the effecting an amicable divorce between Belgium and Holland, the difficulties of which were augmented by the decided aversion of one of the betrothed parties to a separation. William, Prince of Orange, created by the allied sovereigns in 1815 King of the Netherlands, was naturally and pertinaciously averse to the severance from his crown of the better half of his dominions, and its erection, under prince Leopold, into an independent monarchy. But jealousies and differences of all kinds, religious, political, and civil, coupled with the fact that the Belgic population had actually succeeded in expelling the Dutch authorities from their territory, rendered the compulsory maintenance of the union impolitic and, perhaps, impracticable.¶ At first England, France, and Russia jointly interposed their good offices; they succeeded in enforcing a suspension of hostilities, and prescribed the terms of future peace and separation between the belligerents. In these terms the Dutch king refused his concurrence, and Russia declining to act coercively against him, the executive task of enforcing submission by arms devolved on France and England. Novel events followed. The combined English and French fleets, so often hostilely arrayed against each other, peaceably mingled their flags in the Channel; the Scheldt was blockaded, and an embargo laid on Dutch ships in British ports; a French army under Marshal Gerard rapidly penetrated to Antwerp, and, after a brisk bombardment of the citadel, that almost entombed its brave defender, Chassé, in a storm of shells and cannon-balls, they quietly, and without the co-operation of the Belgians, put them in possession of the disputed fortress, which they themselves would perhaps have been unable to conquer, and then again withdrew into the French territory. These form examples of disinterested mediation, of which there are few instances in the history of European diplomacy. Austria, Russia, and Prussia beheld them with watchfulness, and the latter power assembled a large army on the frontier; but neither France nor England being actuated by ambitious impulses, the great object of intervention—the maintenance of the peace of Europe—was secured. The fall of Antwerp, however, did not terminate all differences in the Low Countries; years elapsed before the 24 Articles of separation agreed upon by the London Conference relative to the apportionment of the public debt of Holland and Belgium, and the province of Limburg and the duchy of Luxemburg, which the Belgians coveted, with the concurrence of the population of the disputed territories, as a portion of their new kingdom, were acquiesced in by both parties.

In the same year the aspect of affairs in the East claimed the friendly interference of France and England. A new and crafty power had arisen in that quarter which threatened the entire extinction of the Ottoman empire. The victorious armies of Mehemet Ali, the rebel viceroy of Egypt, commanded by his son Ibrahim, had conquered the whole of Syria, and, after traversing Asia Minor and defeating, in the great battle of Konieh, the Turkish forces under the grand vizier, had almost reached the shores of the Bosphorus. Weakened by internal reforms, which the Turkish aristocracy opposed and the multitude, to whose benefit they tended, did not appreciate, Greece and the Archipelago, Egypt and Algiers, severed from his dominions, and exhausted from the late unsuccessful war with Russia, the Sultan Mahmoud was unable to stand in open field against the Egyptian invaders. In this extremity he applied for assistance to the court of St. Petersburg, the oldest and most dangerous enemy of the Porte. Russia promptly listened to this overture, the leading object of her policy, from the reign of the ambitious Catherine, being to establish her authority in the ancient Byzantium; and, in the first months of 1833, her ships were in motion on the Black Sea, and her armies on the Pruth directed towards the Turkish capital. The European powers became alarmed at these movements; France despatched Admiral Roussin to Constantinople, and the ministers of England and Austria co-operated with the French ambassador in efforts to dissuade the Sultan from his perilous connexion with the emperor Nicholas. They offered to try to stop the march of Ibrahim, and proposed terms of peace to Mehemet Ali, which the pasha rejected, and ordered the advance of his army. Meanwhile a second squadron of Russians anchored in the Bosphorus with numerous troops on board. The Sultan wavered; he was in a dilemma, and had only to choose between accepting the terms demanded by his own vassal, or having his capital garrisoned or, at least, defended by Russian auxiliaries. He adopted the former as the less evil, and Ibrahim retraced his steps towards the passes of Mount Taurus. The Russians, however, continued to linger in the vicinity of Constantinople till the summer, the combined English and French fleets cruising in the Mediterranean to watch their motions, and it was only after the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi had been concluded with the Porte* that the Czar withdrew his armaments from the Bosphorus. Had it not been for the intervention of Britain and France, it is probable the Russians would have occupied Constantinople by degrees, and, under various pretexts, gradually established an authority there hardly less dictatorial than that exercised in the unfortunate capital of Poland. Such an extension of the sway of an overgrown empire, whose despotic institutions are dangerous to civilization, and afford no guarantee of future policy, and which, for the last century, has shown itself actuated by that restless thirst for territorial aggrandizement peculiar to a semi-barbarous state, would have been an European calamity.

Fortunately, the might of Russia is more defensive than aggressive, and there appears little ground for apprehension from any outbreak of adventurous ambition in her sovereigns. In defence she has always shown herself invincible; in aggressive power she is inferior to neighbouring states. It is only towards the East, to which she first opened a passage across the Balkan in 1829, that she finds a penetrable line of resistance; on the west she is confined by the impassable military barrier presented by Austria, Prussia, and the German states; on the ocean, England is the trusty gauler of the North, and, holding the keys of the Baltic and the Euxine by her naval superiority, she can, by blockading the Cattegat and the Dardanelles, when the czar evinces signs of restlessness or a disposition to break his bounds, stop all egress, offensive or commercial, from his vast interior.

Reposing on these securities, all fear of Russian intrigue and Russian ambition vanishes. The treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi formed a natural subject of jealousy with the European courts, especially the separate article, by which the Porte engaged at the instance of Russia to close the strait of the Dardanelles against "any foreign vessel of war." But the English ministry have not been unmindful of any advantage the emperor Nicholas might have secured by this treaty; and at a period subsequent to that under notice, a convention of commerce and navigation was concluded with the Porte, highly conducive to the mercantile interests of Britain, and which places British subjects and British ships on a footing of equality with the most favoured nation with which the Sultan is in alliance.†

The commencement of the domestic history of 1834 is remarkable for the altered tone assumed by the Reform Ministry, who began to feel inconvenienced by the indefinite continuance of that pressure without which had raised them into and mainly supported them in the exercise of authority. The popular storm had swept away the larger masses of abuse, and it was now desirable that the executive and the legislative should subside into and move with less disturbance in their natural channels. The removal of the more palpable evils had been effected, but it was a nicer and more difficult question to deal with those involving complicated and more equally-balanced interests, and respecting which the general opinion was not so unanimous. To enter safely upon these, time, caution, and deliberation were requisite; and such essentials could hardly be reckoned upon so long as the government continued to be hurried forward by an external agency more remarkable for force than a just appreciation of the obstacles to be surmounted. Accordingly ministers sought to separate themselves from the impatient and irregular auxiliaries with whom they had heretofore kept up a friendly intercourse, if not actually concluded a defensive alliance. The tories had been defeated if not humbled, and the Indian war-whoop was no longer requisite to alarm them into further concessions. Downing-street, in consequence, became less accessible to the inroads of the leaders of political unions and parochial deputations; and even the representative organs of the Dissenters were given to understand that though their civil grievances would be listened to and redressed, there existed a firm determination not to countenance any attack, if such were intended, on the established Church.

With these indications the parliamentary session began in February. In May its proceedings were interrupted by divisions in the cabinet. These arose out of the question of the appropriation of the surplus revenues of the Irish church, whether to ecclesiastical or secular purposes. The difficulty was prospective and contingent. There was no surplus to appropriate; nor was it certainly known that there ever would, or to what amount. Government did not seek its agitation; it was unnecessary to the progress of their measures; but a large party in the house of commons, who thought a reform of the Irish church would be incomplete or valueless unless accompanied with a new disposition of its redundant wealth, determined to draw forth an anticipatory parliamentary declaration in its favour. This was the object of the celebrated resolution, moved by Mr. Ward, May 27th. It was supported by a majority of the commons, and a majority of the ministry; but a minority of the cabinet, who dissented from its principle, and held that ecclesiastical property could only be justly applied to ecclesiastical purposes, finding themselves unable to acquiesce in the ministerial basis adopted by their colleagues, withdrew from the administration.

The rupture with Mr. Stanley and sir James Graham, the earl of Ripon and the duke of Richmond, was speedily followed by another, which grew out of the renewal of the Irish Coercion Bill, and involved in its issues the retirement of the noble premier himself. Earl Grey had repeatedly sought to retire in the preceding year, but urged by his colleagues he had been prevailed upon to continue in office. All the pledges he had given at the commencement of his patriotic ministry had been firmly and faithfully, and beyond the public expectation redeemed. Economy in the public expenditure, and improvements in the public offices, had been resolutely promoted. The peace of Europe had been preserved without a compromise of national honour; while at the same time the cause of constitutional liberty had been sought to be advanced in the Peninsula by the conclusion of the Quadruple Alliance with France, Spain, and Portugal. Under his auspices the great question of Parliamentary Reform had been carried; he had commenced life with the advocacy of an amendment of the representation; and this his first wish being realized, and having begun to feel the infirmities of age, it was natural that his lordship should seize the first opportunity to withdraw from the toils and responsibility of government.

Lord Althorp, who had also resigned, having consented to resume the chancellorship of the exchequer, the Reform Ministry was continued, under the premiership of viscount Melbourne, as first lord of the treasury.

Although public business had been delayed by ministerial changes, the second session of the Reformed Parliament, like the first, was distinguished by important legislation. The establishment of the Central Criminal Court, by providing more frequent gaol deliveries, and extending the local jurisdiction of the Old Bailey Court, effected great improvements in the criminal administration of the metropolis and adjoining counties.* An undertaking of still greater difficulty, with which the legislature energetically grappled, was an attempt to amend the administration of the POOR LAWS. In dealing with an old system of domestic polity, parliament evinced no hesitation in departing from established usages and maxims; but how successfully can only be ascertained by a longer term of experience of the moral and social results of the new law than is embraced by the remaining portion of our history.

Numerous errors had been engrafted on the celebrated statute of queen Elizabeth, partly by the legislature itself, and partly by its parochial and magisterial administrators. These had been an anxious subject of inquiry ever since the Peace, and had been sought to be met by the institution of assistant overseers, select vestries, and other remedial enactments. It was not the principle of a compulsory assessment for the relief of the indigence inseparable from society that appeared so objectionable, as its corrupt, wasteful, and injudicious disbursement. In Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and some of the largest parishes of the metropolis, there had already been strenuous efforts made to reform or avert the deterioration of their pauper administration; and where this vigilance and intelligence had been exercised by individuals, they had been found sufficient, even under the old laws, either to amend or prevent the inroad of glaring abuses.

These, however, were exceptions to the general state of the kingdom, especially in the agricultural districts, and the interference of parliament had become necessary. Wages had come to be partly paid out of the poor-rates; no efficient test was applied to distinguish between real and fictitious distress; the rights of settlement were conflicting and productive of expensive litigation; the size of parishes was unequal, and unsuited to an economical and efficient administration; the powers of magistrates were not correctly defined, and were often injudiciously exercised; the Bastardy Laws were supposed to encourage incontinency in females, and offer an inducement to perjury; owing to the equality of suffrage in the rate-payers, the management of the poor frequently fell into the hands of incompetent or unprincipled persons, who perverted their authority to jobbing and selfish purposes: under the operation of these causes the poor-rates had increased in amount without being proportionately beneficial to the poor, who, it was alleged, had been demoralized, rendered idle, refractory, and discontented, by the mal-administration of laws intended solely for their relief and advantage. As a remedy for these manifold evils a more centralized power was deemed expedient, and a board of three commissioners was appointed for five years, invested with almost unlimited authority to reform and superintend the administration of the poor-laws in England and Wales.

It was not exclusively the consideration of benefiting the poor, but also themselves, that induced the legislature to apply with zeal and extraordinary unanimity to a reform of the poor-laws. It was sought as an effective mode of relieving agricultural distress, the existence of which had been unceasingly pressed on the attention of government.* All the property classes suffered by the pressure of the poor-assessment, but the landed interest more than any other. Nearly three-fourths of the entire sum yearly levied as poor-rates are paid by the occupiers and owners of the soil. If, therefore, this burden could be reduced to the amount of two or three millions, by a more vigilant economy, or astringent administration, the territorial proprietary would to that extent be benefited.

* This is only one of many judicial improvements introduced of late years. Of sixty legal defects mentioned by Mr. Brougham, in his celebrated speech, Feb. 7, 1839, fifty-five have in whole, or in part, been removed. It has proved the most useful, as it was the most remarkable oration ever delivered in parliament.

The New Poor Law, as well as the Corn Law, are parts of the same system, chiefly directed to the support of the landlord's rent, but the general government, by countenancing partial legislation, suffers both in character and influence. It is possible, therefore, that the Central Board of Commissioners will be suffered to expire at the end of the five years for which it has been appointed, or so soon as its task of purification has been completed. The executive power of the state cannot, without obloquy, and certainly not with discrimination, execute the duties of overseers and churchwardens. Its business is not local but general administration; not the restraint of vice and improvidence, but crime; not charity to any, but justice to all; not to dole out eleemosynary aid for the relief of the indigence inseparable from changes in the seasons, and vicissitudes in commerce and agriculture, but to afford protection, without interference, alike to all the industrious orders of the community.

Before the close of the year the ministry was again disorganized. It arose out of the death of earl Spencer, and consequent removal of the chancellor of the exchequer to the house of lords. This change had been foreseen and provided for, but the acceptance by lord Althorp of an office compatible with his peerage, not his withdrawal from the cabinet, was the contingency calculated upon. His lordship had been represented by earl Grey, and considered by his successor, viscount Melbourne, as the main support of the government in the house of commons. Upon these grounds the king concluded that lord Althorp formed so essential an element of the ministry, that they would, in consequence of his retirement, be unable to carry on the government, and they were abruptly dismissed. Rumour also ascribed to the king a dislike of the ministerial plans of ecclesiastical reform. No other abiding reason has been assigned for the dissolution of the Melbourne cabinet. It was a sudden impulse of the royal mind, and appeared to the public more like one of those unexpected revolutions that occur in the palace of a despot than of a constitutional monarch. The leading Tories had no share in producing it, the duke of Wellington not having had any communication with the court for two or three months previously,† and sir R. Peel was absent on a tour in Italy. The Reform Ministry was still strong, though it had lost several of its original members, in the support of a majority of the house of commons, and in the existence of greater unanimity than ever among themselves, on all great public questions.‡

The public excitement occasioned by the dissolution of the ministry was hardly less than that which prevailed in 1831-2. The Reform Acts, and all they had accomplished for the people, and all they were expected to accomplish, were considered imperilled by the return of the Tories to power. It was a renewal of the old struggle for mastery between the Conservatives and Liberals of all denominations, but as its progress and termination—the return of sir R. Peel from Italy—his acceptance of the premiership—his pledges to reform all proved abuses—his appeal to the people by a general election—the coalition of the Whigs and Radicals—his defeat by a majority of the new house of commons—and the restoration of the Melbourne ministry, are detailed in the Chronicle, it is only necessary to refer to them under that head. The king, in the first instance, offered the premiership to the duke of Wellington, but he declined the appointment in favour of sir R. Peel. Provisionally his grace accepted the offices of first lord of the treasury and secretary for the home department, and, in the latter capacity, also held the seals of the two other secretaryships. Such a plurality of offices was unusual, but not without precedent, as the earl of Liverpool had once been similarly placed.

The principles on which the PEEL MINISTRY sought to establish itself were not avowedly those of Conservatism, or, if that be different, of Toryism. They were those of their predecessors—submission to the national will, as expressed by a majority of the house of commons. Resistance to reform was not attempted on the basis it used to be offered by the party of Mr. Canning, namely, that any the least concession to the popular demands is pregnant with inappreciable danger, which can never be submitted to as an amendment, but only as a diversion from more fundamental changes in the Constitution. Sir R. Peel solicited the confidence of the country on the ground that he was friendly to change, to improvement—had given proofs of it by his currency bill, and reform of the criminal law—and these he tendered in earnest of his future intentions. By the dissolution of parliament the Conservatives obtained an increase of nearly one hundred members, but even this accession of strength left them in a minority of about fifty. The Opposition, however, was in no hurry to remove them by a direct vote of want of confidence. Sir R. Peel was allowed to bring forward his leading measures, which he did with great dispatch and ability. As the ministerial plans for the relief of the Dissenters and the settlement of tithes were liberal and enlightened in their provisions, they met with general favour and concurrence, and all went on harmoniously till Mr. Ward's test came to be applied. This application the Tories could not withstand. Appropriation they deemed unjust, if not sacrilegious: and rather than be partners in the unholy crusade for applying the surplus wealth of the Irish church to the instruction of an indigent population, they resigned their offices.

The battle of the parties having terminated by the restoration in April of the Melbourne ministry, the business of the parliamentary session was seriously entered upon. The judicious bills of sir James Graham for establishing a public registry of merchant-seamen, and for lessening the necessity of impressment, by encouraging voluntary enlistment into the royal navy, were passed into laws. Infringement of patent rights had long been complained of, and an act, framed under the auspices of lord Brougham, was passed, for better securing the interests of patentees in their discoveries and inventions. By another statute the copyright in public lectures was protected. But the most important legislative measure was the bill for the reform of the Municipal Corporations of England and Wales. The Scottish burghs had been regenerated in 1833. In place of self-elected and self-auditing bodies, a local administration was substituted, responsible to the rate-payers, and a provision made for the extension of the system, if desired by the inhabitants, to Birmingham, Manchester, and other unincorporated towns.*

Another effort at improvement in the internal policy of the empire, which the Legislature evinced a disposition to sanction, and to which its attention had been called by the vigilance of Mr. Hume, was the extinction of the ORANGE SOCIETIES, that had too long been the bane of Ireland by hindering the action of an enlightened and impartial course of government, justly due to the vast majority of her population. It was discovered that these intolerant associations, which sought to pervert government into the selfish domination of a faction, had extended their ramifications into Britain and the colonies, and that, under the auspices of the duke of Cumberland, who, regardless of the proper duties of his station, had lent himself, in the capacity of grand-master, to their odious practices, Orange lodges had been introduced into the army, contrary to its discipline, and the express order of the commander-in-chief. The inquiries of a parliamentary committee, and the condemnatory resolutions passed by the house of commons, arrested the progress, if they did not entirely extirpate, this disturbing and insidious mischief.

Contemporary events abroad possessed considerable interest. France had been the scene of another political revolution. Almost by an accident she had deposed the elder Bourbon in 1830, and almost by an accident the chief fruits of her heroic struggle were wrested from her in 1835. Louis Philippe was thought by some not to have faithfully redeemed his pledges to the people, and his life was repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, sought by defeated royalists, or disappointed republicans. At length a hireling bravo, flamed Fieschi, undertook the odious office of assassin. He failed—the king escaped—but many of the royal suite fell victims of the Corsican's deadly contrivance. The sympathies of the French nation were roused. The king had saved them from anarchy and foreign war, and they felt indignant at the repeated attempts upon his life. The moment was favourable to despotic encroachments, and the Broglie ministry seized it. A desperate contest had been waged, for the last five years, between the revolutionary and juste milieu parties, when the Fieschi atrocity gave a triumphant victory to the doctrinaires. Under the alleged necessity of better securing the monarch's person, and guarding against revolutionary projects, laws were passed by the Chambers curtailing the power of juries, and entirely extinguishing the liberty of the journals. The Parisians, hitherto so jealous of arbitrary power, offered no resistance to the new measures, but acquiesced in them as the price of internal peace, and security from those never-ending plots, and sanguinary insurrections of which both Paris and Lyons had been the theatre since the expulsion of Charles X.*

This unfortunate issue of the struggle for freedom is not without consolatory accompaniments. It is better that the French should have been parties to the surrender of their liberties than that they should have been wrested from them by superior power. Louis Philippe only holds them in trust; they are not alienated, and the trust can be resumed when the nation is so disposed, and the times favourable. In the constitution of the chambers, in the popular diffusion of knowledge, and in the citizen national guard, there are pledges for the future resumption of political freedom—and civil freedom, which is far more important to social happiness, has not been violated. The prevailing disposition of the French is apparent. They are neither royalist nor revolutionary; neither high tory nor ultra-radical. Enlightened by the past, they seek a liberty compatible with order, to avoid extremes, and move along the diagonal line of politics, which is the longest, and by passing through the greatest mass of interests obtains the widest circle of support. This was the system introduced by M. Casimir Perier in 1831, and the experience of the succeeding four years has proved it to be the system most safe and acceptable to the nation.

Besides the political trials and other changes in France, the revolution in the government of Denmark, and the completion of the German Commercial League, form interesting occurrences in the foreign transactions of 1835, and of which notices are given in the Chronicle of that year.

Domestic prospects on the opening of 1836 were flattering and auspicious. Agriculture continued to labour under a partial depression, but it was impossible that the unusual prosperity which pervaded manufactures and commerce should not produce a corresponding animation in rural industry. Ireland presented features uncommon in her public history. Agrarian and tithe outrages still occurred, though less frequently and ferociously, but the remarkable fact in her internal progress was the absence of political strife. A conciliatory rule and disposition to do equal justice to all classes were sought to be substituted for factious oppression and exclusion. Catholicism ceased to be a bar practically, as well as legally, to judicial honours and civil trusts. The wise and liberal intentions of the general government were ably seconded by the firm and popular demeanour of the lord lieutenant, and by Mr. O'Connell and other leaders of Ireland, who beheld, in the conduct of ministers, an earnest of progressive amelioration, if not final and conclusive settlement of Irish grievances. Much had already been conceded, and a tranquil confidence existed that the remaining instalments due to a neglected country would be ultimately forthcoming. The successful legislative efforts already made to render the education of the people more liberal, to reform the magistracy, grand juries, constabulary, and police, and to improve internal communications by means of rivers, bridges, and railways, afforded satisfactory evidence of zeal concerning, and watchfulness over, the interests of Ireland.

In England, in the absence of political stimuli, the excitement which had carried the Reform Acts had gradually subsided, and as the abatement of the popular impulse in one direction is usually followed by the generation of it in another, there were now symptoms of the current setting in a contrary or conservative direction. At all events the prevailing disposition appeared to be not to adventure on further organic changes till the great ones already made had been more fully tried; and the reflective portion of the community, and the intelligent of the radicals themselves, felt indisposed, by premature experiments, to endanger institutions which experience had proved indubitably valuable for the sake of others conferring only doubtful or unimportant benefits. Under the influence of these considerations, what was termed the 'movement' had been, at least, temporarily arrested. The course of public legislation too had been of a kind to operate strongly as a popular sedative. Referring to property rather than personal rights, it did not, like universal suffrage or other wild impracticabilities, in which the multitude fancies itself interested, command the attention of the masses. Even the reform of municipal corporations, which had been the most general question, was of limited concernment, not referring either to the agricultural districts or the largest towns in the kingdom. The other leading questions—legal reforms, the African slave-trade, and the renewal of the charters of the Bank and East India Company were more interesting to lawyers, political economists, and the sectaries than to constitutional agitators. A third cause of quietude was the absence of political partizanship. The strength of the ministerialists was not in their numbers but their measures, which occasionally won them auxiliary aid from all sides. All the old beacons of faction had been confused or displaced by the Reform Acts, and those by whom they were sought scarcely knew where to find them. Sir Robert Peel and the duke of Wellington, lord Stanley, sir J. Graham, Hume, Warburton, and Grote offered a favourable contrast to the profligate adventurers of Queen Anne's reign or the Georges, who never, for a moment, sacrificed party interests to the common weal. By this approximation, by the gravitation as to a centre of adjacent bodies, more than inherent strength, the Melbourne administration has been supported and enabled to carry on the government.

The parliamentary session of 1836 was marked by the same characteristics as those of the three preceding years. Important social amendments were made and practical grievances redressed; but constitutional innovations, tending to the further development of democratic power, were coldly received or openly resisted. By the act for the commutation of tithe, and its conversion into a corn rent-charge, payable in money, some of the strongest objections were obviated that science had urged against a fluctuating impost that taxed industry and enterprise, and varied with the cupidity or caprice of tithe-owners. In the Marriage and Registration Acts some of the scruples of the Dissenters were conciliated, and an important national record of the progress of the population sought to be established. The reduction in the stamp-duty on Newspapers was a concession to a demand generally and vehemently urged for the removal of the fiscal obstruction that impeded the diffusion among the industrious classes of political information. Various measures were projected for the reform of the English Church Establishment, in respect of the disposition of the episcopal revenues, patronage, the incomes of the cathedral, and collegiate foundations; discipline, residence, and pluralities of the parochial clergy. These were neither satisfactory nor successful; only one of the four ministerial bills, and that by a kind of surprise, was carried, the rest being laid aside, either as inefficient or too conservative of the interests of the bishops, to whom the concoction of them had mainly been intrusted, and who had, apparently, framed them more with a view to the well-being of the prelatical order than of their subordinate spiritual brethren, or of the community. The Irish tithe and municipal corporation bills were also among the miscarriages of the session; the former failing from the inclusion of the appropriation clause, and the latter from the determination of the Tories to limit municipal reform to the abolition, not the amendment and continuance of corporate government in Ireland.

Transactions abroad were of a diversified but subordinate character. The great powers of the continent were more occupied in watching over the security of their despotic rule at home than in schemes of territorial ambition. Madrid and Lisbon were successively the scenes of fresh revolutions, of a democratic tendency, which seemed to throw still further into the distance the long-wished-for termination of the intestine divisions of the Peninsula. Enraged by the quarrels and jealousies of the constitutionalists in Spain, and disgusted by the savage warfare waged alike by Christinos and Carlists, France withheld the aid she had stipulated to give by the terms of the Quadruple Alliance, and disbanded the reinforcements intended for the auxiliary legion she had formed at the foot of the Pyrenees. England, notwithstanding, remained true to her engagements—aided the liberals by supplies of arms—afforded openly an effective naval co-operation, under lord John Hay—and indirectly, by the suspension of the Foreign Enlistment Act, allowed colonel Evans to organise and take out a British legion, for the support of constitutional liberty. In the course of the year two more attempts were made to assassinate Louis Philippe, showing the miserable tenure of his existence and authority. Embittered in spirit, and made uneasy by these revengeful attacks on his life, the French king, in his turn, manifested a fierce hostility, amounting to an absolute persecution of the supposed agents of revolution. Russia, Austria, and Prussia, having in concert, and in violation of their own treaty, made a forcible inroad into Cracow, to expel the Polish refugees, who had taken shelter in her territory, Louis Philippe, or his minister, M. Thiers, threatened hermetically to seal up Switzerland, by which the unfortunate adventurers in the cause of liberty in Italy, Germany, and Poland would have been deprived of the only asylum they possessed, except on the terms of prisoners, on the European continent.

Only the early portion of 1837 is embraced by the concluding limits of our history, and its chief occurrences, which are detailed in the Chronicle, do not appear to require preliminary elucidation. Legislative proceedings were arrested by the demise of the crown, and consequent dissolution of parliament. WILLIAM IV. had attained an advanced age, and expired in June, of natural decay. His loss was generally and sincerely regretted by the nation, as that of a good man and beneficent sovereign, who had committed no wrong, provoked no enmity, and whose memory may safely repose undisturbed by the shafts of envy, vengeance, and malignity. The character of the king is easily delineated. It was sincere, plain, and open, without guile, complexity, or indirectness. The long life he had spent before his accession to the throne was unmarked by any adventure or vicissitude out of the common course of mortality; unsignalised by any gross, great, or memorable accompaniment. He had more of the virtues of private life than the endowments of the regal station; those that gain on men's affections, rather than challenge their admiration. Instead of the disturbing passions and commanding faculties that form the chief historical portraits, king William had the less-pretending and often less-hurtful qualities that contribute to domestic comfort and enjoyment—honesty—love of justice—affection to wife and children, to brothers and sisters—steadiness in his attachments to the friends of his early life, and indefatigability in his efforts to serve them, whether by purse or person. On the throne he manifested the same household and true-hearted attributes of an English gentleman, exercising throughout his reign the most unaffected and liberal hospitality, the most active charity, neighbourly kindness, social cordiality, and cheerfulness.

Although the king was not possessed of superior ability or refinement, he was diligent, even laborious, in his efforts rightly to comprehend, and faithfully execute, the duties of his office. His education had not been equal to the standard of the age in which he survived to act a part, no more than that of his brothers, or of George III. and queen Charlotte.* Notwithstanding defects of early culture and natural talent, his name will ever be associated with a portion of British history over which science and humanity may exult with the least alloy of dissatisfaction. The glories of successful warfare signalised the sway of his immediate predecessors; the less melancholy triumphs of peace that of William. During the seven eventful years of his reign the United Kingdom has been revolutionised without violence, without spoliation. All that has not been reformed has been investigated. The veil has been rent asunder, and every establishment, whether legal, ecclesiastical, official, or colonial, has been thrown open to general gaze and scrutiny. Public institutions rest on their merits; and all the central but factitious supports government had been wont to derive from parliamentary boroughs, municipal corporations, commercial monopolies, vast and irresponsible patronage, and lavish fiscal expenditure, have been struck from under it. Opinion alone rules, and that opinion wholly free and unfettered. Whoever can sway it, whether by desert, truth, talent, or illusive arts, governs the nation.

The long and wonderful era of George III. is at an end, and by the rapidity of recent changes, seems thrown back almost to a patriarchal age. Two sons having inherited after him, without issue, and the sceptre descending to a female branch, the dynasty of the house of Brunswick seems to pause on the threshold of a new and unknown existence. A young and illustrious princess succeeds to the throne of the noblest empire in the world, when all is new, institutions, maxims of government, and even social, moral, and religious ideas are in the transition state.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

A.D. 1830, June 26, ACCESSION OF WILLIAM IV.—His present majesty was the third son of George III. and born Aug. 21, 1765. The biography of the king, precious to his accession to the throne, was marked by few memorable incidents. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1779, under the especial charge of captain Digby, in the Royal George, a 98-gun ship. After holding the intermediate commissions, as prince William Henry, he was made rear-admiral of the blue, in 1790, by order in council. He had previously been created a peer of parliament as duke of Clarence. The duke saw no more active service abroad after receiving his flag. He sought employment, however, but his wishes were not gratified, and the only instance, in which the public heard of him in his professional capacity, was in 1814, when, as admiral of the fleet, he escorted Louis XVIII. to France. About 1811, he dissolved a connexion, that had subsisted for twenty years, with Mrs Jordan, a fascinating actress, who had borne him a family of ten children, eight of whom survived. This painful severance of so long a union had become necessary, in consequence of the new plan of life determined upon by the prince, and, so far as a pecuniary settlement could effect it, was made agreeable to his unhappy partner. The duke was married July 11, 1818, to the daughter of the duke of Saxe Meiningen, Adelaide Louisa, who had been strongly recommended to him by queen Charlotte, on account of her amiable qualities and domestic virtues. In the end of the following year, the duchess became the mother of a seven months' child, the princess Elizabeth, who died in her infancy. On three other occasions, before the end of 1821, the duchess had the misfortune to be prematurely confined. In 1827, Mr. Caning, then prime minister, revived the office of lord-high-admiral in the person of the duke of Clarence, after it had been, with one exception, in commission since the death of prince George of Denmark, the consort of Queen Anne. In this office, the duke became popular by promoting 124 lieutenants to the rank of commanders. He resigned in the following year, under the Wellington ministry. No other public event occurred till his accession. Although little was known, either of the political predilections or abilities of the "sailor-king," as he was called, he soon gained in popular favor by his affable manners, and mixing familiarly with the people, which last contrasted favourably with the secluded life of his predecessor.

28. Meeting of delegates from the trades' unions, held at Manchester to form a national association for the prevention of a reduction in wages. No trade to be admitted a member of this aggregate confederacy that is not regularly organized and united in itself. It is arranged, that so soon as the funds will permit, a newspaper shall be established. The contributions of each member is limited to one penny per week. If their contributions amount to a million, it is calculated that their funds will speedily amount to 1,683,333*l*.

29. POSITION OF PARTIES.—A message was delivered from the king, recommending the despatch of business, and announcing the intended dissolution of parliament. Next day, on the duke of Wellington moving an address to his majesty declaring their willingness to forward the public business, earl Grey moved an amendment, to adjourn to give time for the consideration of the civil list and the expediency of a regency. Amendment rejected by 100 to 56. An amendment of similar import was moved in the commons, by lord Althorp, and negatived by 185 to 139. These conflicting motions showed that the alliance between the ministers and the whigs had been dissolved. They had served but received no wages; neither was there a likelihood of their being placed on the ministerial establishment, as the duke was more disposed to make peace with his former colleagues than depend on the volunteer support of the opposition. They had supported him on the same ground that they had supported Mr. Canning, from approval of the liberal portion of his policy, and also under an impression that the waywardness of the late king required to be controlled by a firm man. The same reasons no longer existed; and, moreover, an impression was abroad that the experience the duke had yet had in civil affairs, was not such as to qualify him for the permanent government of the country almost in the capacity of dictator.

July 5. CAPTURE OF ALGIERS.—A powerful armament, fitted out by the French to chastise the Algerines, had sailed from Toulon on the 25th May. It consisted of 68 ships of war, besides transports, conveying 30,852 infantry, 534 cavalry, 2,329 artillery, and 1,330 engineers. M. Bourmont, minister-of-war, was commander-in-chief, attended by 25 interpreters of the Moorish, Arabic, and Turkish languages. Impeded by contrary winds, the expedition was unable to effect a landing on the African coast till the 14th June. The disembarkation was effected without opposition on the peninsula of Sidi Ferruch, between which and Algiers the enemy occupied a fortified camp with 40,000 men. Bourmont attacked the camp; the batteries erected were instantly carried; the Turks and Arabs took to flight, abandoning to the French a vast quantity of provisions, several flocks of sheep, and 100 camels. The victors next advanced towards the city of Algiers. It made a feeble resistance, and, July 5th, the dey concluded a treaty for its surrender; stipulating only for his own personal safety and the security of his private property. Laying aside the royal garments he left the palace, and took up his abode in the city as a private individual, and soon after withdrew with his family into Italy. Within 21 days after landing, and with the loss of less than 500 men, in killed and wounded, the French abated the long-standing nuisance of the piratical regency of Algiers. Except 1500 cannons on the walls, 12 ships of war in the harbour, and the warlike stores in the arsenals, the treasure which was found in the conquered city fell short of the barbaric wealth which had been anticipated by the captors. The expedition had been regarded by Europe as an expedition to chastise an insult; it soon turned out to be a conquest, and marshal Bourmont proceeded to take all the measures necessary to secure Algeria as a French settlement.

15. Remains of George IV. interred at Windsor.

23. Parliament prorogued. The speech delivered by the king to both houses congratulated them on the general tranquillity of Europe. He also expressed his satisfaction at the relief afforded to the people by the repeal of taxes, at the reforms introduced into the judicial establishments of the country, and at the removal of the civil disqualifications which affected numerous classes.

24. PARLIAMENT DISSOLVED.—The chief practical measures of the session had been the repeal of the duties on beer and the opening of the beer-trade. Great complaints had existed, first, against the magistrates, as being either partial or corrupt in the exercise of their powers, in the licensing of public-houses; and, secondly, against the monopoly of the large brewers, who, it was alleged, availed themselves of the proprietorship of many of the ale-houses to force upon the consumer inferior or adulterated beer. The object of the new act was to open the trade. It did not interfere with the power of the magistrates in licensing houses, but it allowed any one to retail beer to be consumed on the premises, merely by taking out a license from the excise. An attempt was made to get rid of death punishment for forgery, but it was defeated in the house of lords. An act passed for the amendment of the libel law; it repealed the punishment of banishment for a second offence, but required additional securities from newspaper proprietors to answer for damages.

26. INSURRECTION IN PARIS.—The appointment of the ministry of prince Polignac, last August, was an open declaration of war against the liberal party. They prepared for the coming storm by forming an association to resist the payment of taxes, by raising subscriptions to indemnify those who might suffer in resisting the exercise of illegal power, and by spirited appeals to the people through the medium of the journals. To the reflecting, the issue of the approaching struggle could never have appeared doubtful. Direct taxes form almost the entire source of the public revenue of France, and a passive resistance to their payment would have greatly embarrassed, if not arrested, the wild design of subverting the national liberties. Nineteenths of the community were favourable to a constitutional system. The press and the people were against ministers; the mercantile and trading classes were opposed to them; and to contend against the general hostility, government had not a great and devoted army, like Napoleon, to overawe discontent, nor, like former kings, a numerous nobility, wealthy church establishment, and servile municipal corporations. It stood weak and insulted, morally and physically. The relative strength of the parties was attested by the prevailing sentiments of the newspapers and the result of the elections. Unable to resist the opposition in the chamber of deputies, the king had had recourse to a dissolution. All the means government possessed were called into exertion to influence the elections, but they entirely failed. In Paris, where the electors amounted to 8,845, only 5,500 voted for the ministerial candidates, while 7,314 voted for the opposition members. It followed, that the newly-elected chamber was more inimical to the court than its predecessor; while the public dissatisfaction had been augmented by the unjustifiable means adopted to control the exercise of the elective franchise. The chamber had not yet met, and ministers seemed determined it never should. Having failed in their appeal to public opinion, they determined on the more hazardous experiment of an appeal to force. The plot opened with a report addressed to the king, drawn up by M. Chantelauze, and signed by him and Polignac, D'Haussez, Peyronnet, Montbel, Kanville, and Capelle, recommending the suppression of the periodical press, on account of its seditiousness, which legal prosecutions had been unable to control; and the re-construction of the chamber of deputies, on the ground of its democratic character. This report appeared in the Moniteur, on the morning of Monday, July 26. On the same day, and in the same paper, appeared the famous ordinances in conformity with the report, dated the 26th, signed by the king and countersigned by his ministers. By the first ordinance, the liberty of the press is suppressed, and no journal allowed to be published without the authority of the government. By the second, the chamber of deputies, which was to meet August 3rd, is dissolved. By the third, a new scheme of election was introduced, which destroyed the franchises of three-fourths of the electors and reduced the number of deputies from 430 to 258 members. Thus, the constitution was swept away by royal mandates, issued without colour of authority, beyond a manifest perversion of the 14th article of the Charter. Several hours elapsed before the ordinances were generally known, and then the capital began to display symptoms of rising agitation. The editors and proprietors of the journals assembled, and having resolved that the ordinances were illegal, they determined to publish their papers on the following day. A statement of their views, signed by thirty-eight persons, the conductors and proprietors of twelve journals, was published in the National. "In the situation in which we are placed," said they, "obedience ceases to be a duty. We are dispensed from obeying. We resist the government in what concerns ourselves. It is for France to determine how far her resistance ought to extend." Government naturally anticipated a formidable resistance. But military precautions had been taken. The most energetic measures had been adopted by Polignac without consulting his colleagues, but in concert with marshal Marmont, duke of Ragusa, for securing the execution of the ordinances by force of arms. On the day the ordinances were signed, the command of the whole garrison of Paris was given to Marmont. It consisted of 4,750 men of the guards, 4,400 troops of the line, 1,100 men belonging to the veteran battalion, and 1,300 gendarmes making in all, 11,500. Conformably to their announcement, the journalists prepared to issue their papers on the 27th, when the gendarmerie and other agents of police entered and began scattering the types and breaking the presses, which not being quietly submitted to, crowds speedily collected round the scene of violence. The most resolute stand was made at the offices of the Temps and National; they refused admission to the police, and no blacksmith could be found who would pick the locks. At last, the services of an artisan, employed to rivet the manacles of galley-slaves, enabled them to enter. The electors of Paris had met in the spacious room where the association "Aide toi, et le Ciel t'aidera" held its sittings, and with prompt unanimity had determined to oppose force to force, if the ordinances were not immediately withdrawn. The plan of operations was soon decided on. Deputations were to wait on the manufacturers, printers, builders, and other capitalists, requesting them to discharge their work-people, which was done; and on the 27th, 50,000 unemployed workmen were collected in different parts of the capital, in groups, crying Vive la Charte! in presence of the royal guard. In the course of Tuesday, about thirty deputies, who had arrived in Paris preparatory to the opening of the chamber, met at the house of M. Casimir Perier. They were few in number, but determined and resolved to encourage the rising of the people. The square of the Palais Royal, the rue St. Honoré, and other adjacent streets were the places where the assemblages of the people, on the 27th, were the largest, and became the first scenes of the sanguinary strife that was about to commence. The troops were all under arms; on these points they were numerous, and without any provocation from the people except their cries, the military began to use their arms. A charge of mounted gendarmerie took place, sabreing every body before them, and the infantry of the guards fired several volleys on the unarmed multitude. The first hostile act on the popular side is said to have been a shot discharged from the Hotel Royal by an Englishman, named Foulkes. The fire was returned and Foulkes killed. Reports were spread of others killed or wounded, and of women among the sufferers. Indignant at the wretched shedding of blood, the citizens prepared to act with energy. It was evident a deadly battle was to be fought, and the black flag, which was raised in various quarters, indicated the nature of the coming struggle. The night of the 27th was spent in preparation. The citizens armed themselves in good earnest; pistols, sabres, bayonets, and offensive weapons of every description, were laid hold of. The shops of the armourers were visited, and they carried off the arms and ammunition deposited in an unoccupied barrack. There were known to be 40,000 equipments of the national guard in Paris, which Charles X. had disbanded. In every street men were employed in digging up the large stones with which Paris is paved; part of these were carried to the tops of the houses, and the rest, together with the omnibuses and fiacres, used in constructing across the streets barricades, at successive distances of about fifty paces. Many of the fine trees on the boulevards were thrown across the road, and the lamps demolished or extinguished. By daybreak, on the 28th, the citizens were nearly ready, and soon after nine o'clock shots began to fly. A bonfire at the end of the rue St. Denis, made of the window shutters of the Quotidienne, was the first open symptom of war. Here and there, a national guard began to be seen in uniform, hastening, amidst the cheers of the people, to the Hotel de Ville. Parties of the cavalry and lancers galloped up and down, and occasionally a man, shot from a window or other retreat, was seen to fall backward in his seat. At ten o'clock, Marmont formed six columns of attack; they were preceded by cannon, and directed to concentrate round the Hotel de Ville. For a moment, the populace yielded to the superiority of the artillery and regular troops. They abandoned the open places and large streets, to take shelter behind the barriers and within the houses. From these points they kept up an incessant fire of musquetry, and poured on the troops a shower of paving stones and other destructive missiles. Notwithstanding, some of the advancing columns succeeded in penetrating to the grand centre of attack, the Hotel de Ville. Here the fight was bravely maintained by the national guards. The fire of the defenders from the upper part of the building was unceasing, while the cannon of the assailants thundered from below. It was taken and retaken several times, the Swiss at last remaining masters, but they were forced to abandon their dear-bought conquest next morning. Amidst the conflicts of the day, Marshal Marmont wrote to Charles X., at the palace of St. Cloud, saying, "It is no longer a riot—it is a revolution. It is urgent your majesty should take the means of pacification." The king returned by an aide-de-camp a verbal message to the marshal, urging him "To be firm, to unite his forces in the Carrousel and on the place Louis XV., and to act with masses." The last words Charles twice repeated. The duchess of Berri and the dauphin were with the king, but did not speak. According to the testimony of M. Arago, the astronomer, Marmont's heart was never in the cause for which he was fighting; but, as a soldier, he felt bound to obedience. (Ann. Reg. lxxii. 200.) Count Lobau, general Gerard, and MM. Lafitte Perier, and Mauguin, with the laudable design of stopping the carnage, waited upon Marmont at his head-quarters, at the Tuileries. They proposed to stop the insurrection by a repeal of the ordinances, the dismissal of ministers, and the assembling of the chambers. Prince de Polignac, who, with others of the ministers, was in an apartment adjoining to the marshal's, appeared inclined to listen to these proposals, but hesitated, and finished by declaring that the ordinances could not be withdrawn. It only remained, therefore, to continue the bloody strife. In the course of the day, Marmont had declared Paris in a state of siege, which subjected the inhabitants to martial law, and he issued warrants for the arrest of M. Lafitte and some others, but, after his interview with the deputation, recalled the warrants. The citizens spent the night of the 26th in strengthening their defences, in removing the slain, and providing for the wounded. Reports of fire-arms continued to be heard till midnight, which, with the noise of the breaking up of pavements and the erection of fresh barricades, showed that the struggle was not over. At half-past three in the morning, the tocsin began to sound, and cries of Aux armes / were heard in various quarters. On the third day, two regiments of the line joined the people. At ten o'clock, the citizens of St. Jacques, St. Germain, the Odeon, and Gros Caillon, excited by the sound of the tocsin from almost all the churches, and by shouts of Five la Charte / came forth in arms, the mass amounting to 5,000. They had to combat the defenders of the Louvre and the Tuileries. The attack began in the Garden of Infants. The royal guard permitted the first assailants to approach, and there the contest ended almost as soon as it was begun by the slaughter of the front rank. Almost at the same instant, fresh assailants drove back the defenders of this important post. In the midst of a constantly rolling fire, the iron railings were broken down. This manoeuvre, which, in the end, made the citizens masters of the Tuileries, was effected with extraordinary resolution and rapidity. Still resistance was offered, with bloody obstinacy, on other points, particularly the Pavilion of Flora, from which a slaughtering fire had been kept up from seven in the morning on the Pont Royal. As soon as the Pavilion was taken, every article of furniture and thousands of scattered papers, among which were proclamations to the troops, were thrown out of the windows. Twice the palace of the Tuileries was taken and abandoned, but at half-past one the citizens were finally victorious, and two tri-coloured flags were placed on the central pavilion. Marmont, finding all was lost, withdrew his troops, and by three o'clock in the afternoon of the 29th Paris was left entirely at the command of the triumphant population. The national guard was organized, and the veteran of patriotic revolutions, general Lafayette, took the command. In their glorious struggle the citizens were assisted by some old soldiers of the empire, and the pupils of the Polytechnic School who gallantly led them to the charge, and whose military studies qualified them to direct their operations effectively. The slaughter was great, especially, as might be expected, of the civic combatants, but the prize contended for was worthy the sacrifice. Of the citizens, 390 were killed on the spot, and of 2,500 wounded, 306 died. Of the royal guard, 375 were killed and wounded, and of gendarmes 202. It appeared on the subsequent trial of Polignac and his colleagues, that the commanders of corps carried about with them written orders to fire on the people without reserve or waiting for directions from the civil power. The soldiers were encouraged to fight by a lavish distribution of money, 974,291 francs having been issued for the purpose by M. Montbel, the minister of finance. During the memorable three days, the weather was uncommonly fine.

30. Charles X. retires to Rambouillet.

31. The Chamber of Deputies voted that the ordinance for their dissolution being contrary to the charter, they are legally constituted. They, then resolved that, the safety of the state requiring an immediate governor, Louis Philip, duke of Orleans be requested to accept the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The duke, who had arrived in Paris the preceding night, and who was assisted by the councils of prince Talleyrand, declared his acceptance of the office, and issued a proclamation to the Parisians, concluding with the emphatic pledge, "The charter will henceforth be a truth."

Aug. 3. Chambers opened by the lieutenant-general. About 200 deputies were present. The galleries were crowded with peers, general officers of the old army, the diplomatic body, &c. The duke pronounced his speech with an audible voice, and referred, with emphasis, to violations of the charter, and to guarantees against future encroachments. "Attached," said he, "by inclination and conviction to the principle of a free government, I accept, beforehand, all the consequences of it."

5. Mr. Brougham elected member for the county of York. Alluding to the revolution in France, and to the probable policy of the European governments in consequence, he told the electors that "England was bound over in heavy recognizances to keep the peace; a debt of 800 millions was the amount of our recognizances, and he had no fear they would be broken." Up to the present time, the learned gentleman, during his long parliamentary career had sat for one of the nomination boroughs of the whig lords; after his unsuccessful stand for Liverpool, in 1812, he was without a seat for three sessions; but was again brought into the house of commons for lord Darlington's borough of Winchilsea, at the request of earl Grey, and which he continued to represent till returned by the independent constituency of Yorkshire.

NEW FRENCH CHARTER.—In a sitting of the chamber of Deputies it was resolved that on agreeing to certain modifications in the charter of Louis XVIII., the duke of Orleans should be acknowledged sovereign, with right of perpetual succession in his male descendants, in order of primogeniture, under the title of the king of the French, the title of "king of France" being abandoned as savouring of feudalism; France belonging to Frenchmen, not the king. The preamble and various clauses in the old charter were suppressed; others were altered on important points. No state religion is acknowledged, but the ministers of all sects of christian denominations to be supported at the public expense. The king is the supreme head of the state; he may make regulations necessary to the execution of the laws, but has no suspensive power. The initiation of laws, their enactment by majorities of the two chambers, with the sanction of the king, the contemporaneous session of the two chambers, the election of a speaker or president, and the settlement of the civil list during the whole reign, are assimilated to the English practice. The sittings of the peers are made public; they were private under the old charter. Deputies to be elected for five years, in lieu of a renewal of one-fifth every year. Persons eligible to be elected deputies at 30 years of age in lieu of 40, and electors to vote at 25 in lieu of 30. Lastly, all the peerages created during the reign of Charles. 93 in number, are annulled. The peers took no part in the framing of the new constitution, further than to signify their adhesion to all its articles, with the exception of that which disqualified the members of their own body, leaving it "to the high prudence of the prince lieutenant-general."

9. Louis Philip took the oath faithfully to observe the constitutional charter, in the presence of the chamber of deputies. He then addressed, in a short speech, the assembled peers and deputies, saying, that he "had maturely weighed the important duties imposed upon him, and he was conscious of being able to fulfil them." The hall resounded with acclamations; and the king returned to the Palais Royal, where he gave a grand dinner to the peers, deputies, and others distinguished by talent or social position. At night, Paris was illuminated.

17. Charles X. arrived in England.

Meeting at the London Tavern, at which an address, from the pen of Dr. Bowring, to the citizens of Paris, congratulating them on the July revolution, was unanimously agreed to. Henry Warburton, M.P., in the chair.

25. REVOLUTION IN BELGIUM.—The spirit of resistance, which had been awakened by the events in France, visited Brussels with a revolution, no less unexpected and rapid than that which had occurred in Paris. When Belgium was joined to Holland, in 1815. to form the kingdom of the Netherlands, the union was one of convenience on the part of the allied sovereigns, by whom it was negotiated, to raise a powerful bulwark on the frontier of France: it was not attended by any congeniality of habits or interests in the communities who were thus joined together. There were differences of national character, of religion, and, in some measure, of language. The Belgians considered the union compulsory, and the terms of it unequal. They complained that the king himself, a Dutchman and stadtholder of Holland, sacrificed his acquired dominions to his hereditary; that Dutchmen were allowed a monopoly of offices; that they were taxed for Dutch debts and Dutch objects; that their religion, and institutions for education connected with it, was discouraged; that their own language even had been banished from their courts of law; that Belgium, in short, was governed as a conquered province, not as an integral portion of an independent national federation! These grievances had formed the topics of complaint in the liberal newspapers, during the past year, and their editors, M. Potter, Tielmons, and Bartels, had been the subject of government prosecutions. The catholic priests were also among the discontented. They complained of the nomination by the king of certain high ecclesiastical dignitaries, and of his interference in the catholic seminaries of education. This was nearly the state of affairs, when on the 25th a riot broke out at Brussels, directed against a local tax, enhancing the price of bread. The vengeance of the populace was chiefly directed against the National, a newspaper in the interest of the Dutch party, and against the minister of justice, M. Van Maanen, whose house was attacked, gutted, and burnt to the ground. The rioters broke into the wine and spirit shops, and obtained a supply of arms from the gun-smiths. The troops were called out, they fired and blood was shed. But the rioters, instead of being discouraged, became exasperated. The streets were about to become the scene of terrible conflicts, when the military, taught by the recent lesson in Paris of the risks of street warfare with a furious multitude, withdrew, leaving the insurgents masters of the city. A burgher guard, on the plan of the French national guard, was then formed of the middle classes, for the protection of property, a provisional authority established, and communications opened with the government at the Hague. Insurrections speedily followed at Liege, Namur, and other cities, and an unanimous and inveterate spirit of hostility to the union with Holland speedily showed itself through the Netherlands. The prince of Orange repaired to Brussels to receive a representation of grievances; but was not permitted to enter the city accompanied by the troops:

he promised to use his good offices with his father and the States-General.

Sept. 6. Riot at Oxford, in which the military, who were conducting some prisoners to the castle for rioting and trespass on Otmoor, were attacked by the populace and the prisoners rescued.

6. Insurrection at Brunswick, which continued some days, during which the palace was set on fire and destroyed. The reigning duke, who had rendered himself odious by his weakness and tyranny, fled to England; but, at length, prince William, his brother, with the assistance of a burgher guard, succeeded in restoring tranquillity.

9. Political commotion at Dresden; a few days after which, the king of Saxony, Anthony, resigned his authority to his nephew, Frederick, whom he appointed regent. There were also commotions at Berlin, Hamburg, Hesse Darmstadt, and other places in the northern parts of Europe.

15. DEATH OF MR. HUSKISSON.—Today was fixed for the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway; it had been far years in progress, and up to May 31 the expenditure on the works amounted to 7,391,656*l*. The duke of Wellington, Mr. Huskisson, and other public characters, had been invited to be present at the opening ceremony. A very handsome carriage, prepared for the duke, led the procession from Liverpool. At Parkfield, the engines stopped to renew the feeders and take in a supply of fuel. Here, contrary to the printed directions of the directors, several gentlemen descended from the carriages, among them, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. William Holmes, M. P., thinking the moment favourable for bringing Mr. Huskisson and the duke together, and for producing a renewed good feeling between them, led Mr. Huskisson round to that part of the car where the duke was stationed, who perceiving the advance of the hon. gentleman, immediately held out his hand to him, which was shaken in a very cordial manner. At this moment, the Rocket was perceived to be on the advance, and there was a general cry Get in! Get in! Mr. Huskisson hesitating, was knocked down by the steam-carriage, which went over his thigh and lacerated him in so dreadful a manner as to occasion his death the following night. On being raised from the ground, by the Earl of Wilton and Mr. Parkes, Mr. Huskisson said, "This is my death—God, forgive me!" An occasion of very natural exultation was thus converted into one of mourning. Mr. Huskisson was in the 60th year of his age, and, with lord Dudley, headed a small but clever political section, of which the Grants, lord Palmerston, and Mr. William Lamb, were members. He did not stand high, any more than his party, for public disinterestedness; nor was he distinguished for eloquence: he had neither the graces of diction, fluency, nor readiness of speech; but was acute, full, and correct in information, and was listened to with deference by the house of commons, especially on commercial subjects, with the principles and statistics of which he was well acquainted. His life had been mostly spent in office, to which he was passionately attached, and at the last unhappy catastrophe seems to have been engaged, in concert with Mr. Holmes, in an amicable overture to the minister by whom he had been haughtily treated.

18. Died in Frith-street, Soho, in his fifty-second year, WILLIAM HAZLITT, a gifted but eccentric writer on general literature. He was a native of Maidstone, and the son of a dissenting minister, and at an early period of life applied himself to painting, which, as a profession, he soon relinquished for the kindred one of letters, though he always retained an intense love for the productions of the pencil, on which he could descant with great taste, fancy, and eloquence. The first acknowledged production of his pen was an "Essay on the Principles of Human Action;" a subject, perhaps, not the most happily chosen for a maiden attempt, nor the best suited to the intellect of Hazlitt, which, though bold and acute, hardly possessed the strength and coherence essential safely to conduct him through the recesses of metaphysical philosophy. His "Characters of Shakspeare's Plays," was a more successful work, attracted much notice and procured great credit for the writer. It was in criticism, poetry, and the fine arts, in sketches of life, manners, and public characters, that Mr. Hazlitt excelled and threw off impressions, not always correct in the drawing, but possessing much general beauty, force, and originality. He was, however, very unequal; much of what he wrote might have been advantageously omitted; and in straining after vulgar effect he fell into exaggerations in style and sentiment. He was an uncompromising liberal in politics, and seemed to carry out his own notion of a true partisan in being "a good hater;" and, on the other hand, he was not deficient in the opposite extreme of being rather indiscriminate in his idolatry, of which his "Life of Napoleon" is an instance. Mr. Hazlitt delivered two or more courses of Lectures on the British poets and writers of the Elizabethan age. He was a profuse contributor of essays and criticisms to the London newspaper and periodical press; and wrote a curious publication, "The Modern Pygmalion," giving an account of his own amours, after the manner of his favourite author Rousseau, in his "Confessions."

Haslitt was partly a Robert Burns in prose.

21. DUTCH ASSAULT ON BRUSSELS.—

The populace who had driven out of the city the Dutch troops (Aug. 25), finding their authority superseded by the burgher guard, rose and overpowered them. These divisions, between the middle and working classes, seemed to present a favourable opportunity to the Dutch to recover possession of the city and crush the rebellion in its birth-place. They advanced towards Brussels, but the insurgents, aided by a determined body of 300 men from Liege, prepared to give them a warm reception. Baricades were formed at the gates; the pavement torn up, and the stones carried to the tops of the houses lining the streets through which the troops would have to advance. The assault began on the 21st. The gate was speedily cleared by the artillery, but when the troops came to advance up the streets they were overwhelmed from above with showers of stones, heavy pieces of furniture, hatchets, and every species of missile. At one point they were successful, but could not penetrate farther than the park and upper part of the town. On the two following days the conflict was kept up with unabated spirit on both sides, but the troops gained no advantage, and the insurgents kept their ground. On the night of the 22d, a rumour was spread that the city would be delivered up to plunder for two days if mastered, which induced the richer citizens to join the populace. Hostilities did not entirely cease till the 27th, when prince Frederick, finding to carry and retain the city would be a hopeless attempt, retreated. The loss on the side of the inhabitants was 165 killed and 311 wounded. Civil war had now openly commenced, and Oct. 4th., the provisional government issued a proclamation declaring the independence of Belgium. As yet, Ghent and Antwerp had taken no part in the insurrection; but three weeks later, the inhabitants of the latter rose against the Dutch garrison, and throwing open their gates to the Belgians, compelled general Chassé to take shelter in the citadel, whence he began to cannonade the town with red-hot shells and balls, doing immense damage, the city being set on fire in different parts and many lives lost. It was, at length, agreed to suspend the firing, on condition that the Belgic auxiliaries retired, leaving Antwerp to the care of its inhabitants, and the Dutch remaining in possession of the citadel. So far, the progress of events had been uninterrupted by the interference of foreign powers. The kingdom of the Netherlands, as before stated, had been created by Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and even France had been a party to it. Upon this ground, they assumed a right of mediation between the belligerents; and on the 4th November a protocol was signed at London, declaring that hostilities should cease, and that the troops of the contending parties should retire within the limits which, previous to May 30, 1814, separated Belgium from the United Provinces.

30. The independence of the South American republics is acknowledged by France.

Oct. 5. Proclamation issued by the president of the United States, declaring the ports of that country open to the British trade, and the repeal of the laws restricting the intercourse with British colonial ports.

9. Intelligence of the loss of eighteen ships engaged in the northern whale fishery: the crews were saved.

11. Grand dinner at Birmingham, to celebrate recent events in France, to which 3700 persons sat down.

14. Several parishes of the metropolis passed resolutions against the New Police. They objected chiefly to the increased expense it imposed on the inhabitants.

17. Tumults at Paris, in consequence of a law having been introduced for abolishing the punishment of death for political offences, which the populace considered an indirect attempt to save the lives of the Polignac ministry. Disturbances quelled by the national guard.

26. MEETING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT.—The elections had gone strongly against ministers. The chief whig and tory borough proprietors had been opposed to them; events in France had also operated unfavourably. It had been currently represented that prince Polignac had been made minister by the influence of the duke of Wellington, and that the latter, if he had not suggested, had approved of his policy, though he might now dislike the rashness with which its execution had been attempted. There was no truth in this representation, as the prompt acknowledgment of the government of Louis Philip by the duke attested; but it had answered the temporary purpose of declamation and excitement during the elections. So strong was the general feeling against the ministry, that not a single cabinet minister obtained a seat by any thing approaching to an open and popular election. Liverpool had again returned the late Mr. Huskisson and general Gascoyne, both of them hostile, though on different grounds, to the administration. The economical labours of Mr. Hume recommended him to the multitudinous freeholders of Middlesex; and Mr. Brougham, as before noticed, was returned for Yorkshire, though wholly unconnected with that great county. Two brothers of Mr. Secretary Peel and his brother-in-law lost their elections. Mr. Croker was ejected from Dublin university on account of his pro-catholic vote. The general results of the elections were as follows. Of the 92 members returned by the English counties, only 28 were steady adherents of the ministry; 47 were avowed adherents of the opposition, and 7 were neutral. Of thirteen great cities and boroughs returning 28 members, only three seats were held by decided ministerialists, 24 by decided oppositionists. Of 236 members returned by elections, more or less popular, in England, only 79 were ministerial votes; 141 were in avowed opposition, and 16 of a neutral cast. Ministers, therefore, could only look for a majority among the close boroughs and the Scotch members; and among these, the great families that commanded the largest number of members were among their opponents. The following is a classification of the new parliament, according to the interests and connexions of the members:—

Agricultural Interests . . .	356
East India Interests . . .	62
West India Interests . . .	35
Bankers . . .	33
Officers in the Army . . .	89
Officers in the Navy . . .	24
Lawyers . . .	54
Placemen and Pensioners . . .	219
Relations of Peers . . .	256
Miscellaneous . . .	51

Many of the members belonged to several classes or interests, which being enumerated in each swells the nominal number above 658.

28. Their majesties visit Drury-lane theatre.

30. A public meeting of the magistrates and landowners of Kent, held at Canterbury, to consider the alarming state of that county, at which the necessity of taking measures to alleviate the distresses of the labourers was conceded, as well as active precautions against the destruction of their property by incendiary fires.

Nov. 2. KING'S SPEECH.—The commons having again chosen Mr. Manners Sutton for their speaker, and the members taken the oaths, the first session of the new parliament was opened by a speech from the throne. His majesty informed them of the alteration that had taken place in the reigning family of France; deeply regretted the state of affairs in the Low Countries, and expressed the intention of endeavouring, in concert with his allies, to devise means to restore tranquillity; held out hopes of an amicable arrangement being made with the reigning power of Portugal; recommended a provision for a regency in case of a demise of the Crown; placed the hereditary revenues at the disposal of the commons; lamented the destruction of property by fire and the breaking of machinery; expressed satisfaction at the continuance of peace and commercial prosperity, and concluded with expressing reliance on the firmness and wisdom of parliament. Addresses in both houses were carried without a division, but not without discussion. Earl Grey took occasion to urge the necessity of an immediate reform of Parliament, which elicited from the duke of Wellington a declaration that the legislature deserved and possessed the confidence of the country; that it could not be improved; and that he was determined to oppose any measure for that purpose, if brought forward. This uncalled for and haughty interdict, both as respected the present and future prospects of reform, excited a strong and indignant feeling among the people. In the commons, Mr. Brougham gave notice that he would that day fortnight submit to the house a proposition on parliamentary reform. Next day, on bringing up the report on the address, Mr. Tennyson and other members took occasion to comment on the declaration of the minister against reform.

3. Change in the French ministry, which is now composed as follows:—M. Lafitte, president of the council and minister of finance; Marshal Maison, minister of foreign affairs; Count Montalivet, minister of the interior; M. Dupont de l'Eure, keeper of the seals; Marshal Soult, minister of war; M. Merithon, minister of public instruction; and General Sebastiani, minister of the marine.

7. Intended visit of the king to the city on lord-mayor's day postponed by the advice of his ministers. They had received a great many letters from individuals, apprising them of the unfavourable reception they were likely to receive; among them, one from Mr. Charles Pearson, and another from Mr. John Key, the lord-mayor elect, who suggested to the duke of Wellington that he should come "strongly and sufficiently guarded." During the Saturday and Sunday, industrious attempts had been made by placards to inflame the public mind against the royal speech, the anti-reform declaration of the duke, and the new metropolitan police. It is likely there would have been riot and perhaps bloodshed, and it was to avoid these his grace advised that the king's visit should be postponed. "If firing had begun," said the duke to Sir W. Knighton, "who could tell where it would end? I know what street-firing is: one guilty person would fall, and ten innocent be destroyed. Would this have been wise or humane, for a little bravado, or that the country might not have been alarmed for a day or two?"—(Sir William Knighton's Memoirs, II., 182.)

8. Upon the motion of the marquis of Lansdowne, considerable discussion arose on the abandonment of the king's visit to the city. Earl Grey, the duke of Richmond, and other peers, contended that the postponement was uncalled for; that it had excited needless alarm; and produced an extraordinary depression of the funds. The subject was also agitated in the house of commons. Ministers defended themselves on the ground of the numerous communications they had received confirmatory of intended tumult and outrage.

12. The Chancellor of the Exchequer having submitted his resolutions to the house for the settlement of the Civil List, Sir H. Parnell, complaining of its want of economy and the confusion of its details, gave notice of a motion that it be referred to a select committee.

15. According to notice, Sir H. Parnell moved for a select committee, which, after a considerable debate, was carried against ministers by 233 against 204, leaving them in a minority of 29.

16. Ministers resign their places.

22. EARL GREY'S MINISTRY.—The withdrawal of the support of the whigs, and the composition of the new parliament, as already described, unaided by the indiscretions of its chief, are sufficient to account for the dissolution of the Wellington cabinet. On the day the new ministry kissed hands on their appointments, lords Grey and Lansdowne took occasion to declare in the Lords the principles upon which they, with other members of the administration, had accepted office. These were peace, retrenchment, and reform. Some hasty expressions of Mr. Brougham led to rumours that he would not form part of the new ministry, and that he intended to follow up the notice he had given by bringing forward the subject of parliamentary reform. These proved premature. The celebrated reform ministry consisted of the following members:—

Earl Grey, First Lord of the Treasury.
 Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President.
 Viscount Melbourne, Chancellor of the Exchequer.
 Viscount Melbourne, Home Secretary.
 Viscount Palmerston, Foreign Secretary.
 Viscount Goderich, Colonial Secretary.
 Lord Auckland, President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint.
 Sir James Graham, First Lord of the Admiralty.
 Lord Holland, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.
 Charles Grant, President of the India Board.
 Earl of Carlisle, No Office.

C. W. W. Wynn, Secretary at War.
 Sir James Kempt, Master General of the Ordnance.

 George Agar Ellis, First Commissioner of Land Revenue.
 Duke of Richmond, Postmaster General.
 Robert Grant, Judge Advocate General.
 Sir Robert Spencer, Surveyor General.
 Lord Nugent, Robert Vernon Smith, Francis Baring, and Hon. G. Ponsonby, Lords of the Treasury.
 Poulett Thomson, Vice-President of the Board of Trade.
 Duke of Devonshire, Lord Chamberlain.
 Marquis Wellesley, Lord Steward.
 Earl of Albemarle, Master of the Horse.
 Marquis of Winchester, Groom of the Stole.

Mr. Brougham's patent of peerage had not reached the clerk of parliament on the 22nd, so he could only take his place on the woolsack as speaker, in virtue of his office as lord chancellor.

29. POLISH INSURRECTION.—The flame of popular insurrection, which had visited France, Belgium, and Germany, spread eastward to Poland. Here, however, the insurrection did not appear to rise immediately from political discontents, but to have been the instantaneous result of an insulting proceeding on the part of the viceroy, the grand duke Constantine, whose savage character had excluded him from popularity wherever his power had been felt. He had taken offence at the young men attending the military school at Warsaw, because at a social banquet they had toasted the memory of Kosciuszko. For this he ordered some of the young men to be flogged, and others of them to be sent to prison. To resist this tyrannical proceeding, and exact vengeance for the disgrace of the punishment, their companions rose in arms on the 29th inst. The Russian guards were called out to suppress them, and immediately the Polish regiments, who formed part of the garrison, joined the students. As the contest became hotter, national antipathy roused the townspeople. Assisted by the troops, they forced their way into the arsenal and supplied themselves with arms. This great accession of strength decided the day; the Russian troops, after a bloody contest in the streets of Warsaw, were driven out of the city and compelled to retire to the other side of the Vistula. The grand duke himself narrowly escaped from his palace. The Poles being thus masters of the city, a provisional administration was formed, consisting of the most popular and influential of the nobility. Two commissioners were sent to Petersburg, in order, if possible, to effect an amicable settlement with the emperor. But Nicholas refused to listen to their representations, and issued a proclamation, in which he threatened to inflict on the Poles the most severe punishment for what he described as "their horrid treason." The Poles, undismayed, prepared to meet the terrible conflict that awaited them, and, after the manner of old Rome, made choice of a "Dictator," general Joseph Clopicki.

Dec. 17. DEATH OF SIMON BOLIVAR.—The Liberator expired at San Pedro, a voluntary exile, in the 48th year of his age. He was of noble parentage, born in the city of Caraccas, but educated in Europe. It was by his heroic exertions the republic of Columbia had been established, and he generously lent his aid to establish the independence of Peru. Bolivar was a man of splendid abilities and magnanimous dispositions. Brave, eloquent, energetic, and untiring, he never ceased to struggle, often under the most disheartening reverses, against the yoke of Old Spain, till he finally achieved the deliverance of his country. He seems, however, not to have been so successful in civil government as in his military enterprises. "An ardent lover of fame, the Columbians were apprehensive he might tread in the steps of Napoleon, rather than those of Washington. It was to quiet these apprehensions that Bolivar, in the preceding April, had resigned the office of president, and which, he said, he did to remove all suspicion of his ambition, and with a sincere wish to promote the welfare of the republic. The people soon became sensible that they had done their great leader injustice, and his restoration was only prevented by his premature death.

21. Trial of the French ministers. Polignac, Peyronnet, Chantelauze, and Raville, for high treason, concluded; being found guilty, they were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. Accusations had also been carried in the chamber of deputies against the other ministers M. M. D'Haussez, Capelle, and Montbel, who, more fortunate than their colleagues, had succeeded in their flight. The trial began on the 15th, and the duration of each sitting was from ten in the morning till four in the afternoon. About 160 peers were generally present. The first three days were devoted to examining the accused and to hearing and reading the evidence; the remainder of the time was occupied by the speeches of the commissioners appointed by the chamber of deputies to conduct the prosecution, and by the defences of the counsel for the several prisoners.

26. General Lafayette resigns the command of the national guard of France.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—The distressed condition of the agricultural population led to a novel species of outrage in the autumn of this year. The rioters did not assume the character of mobs, nor did they profess to seek any political object. Their attacks were directed against private property. Night after night, fires were lighted up by bands of incendiaries; corn-stacks, barns, farm-buildings, and live-stock were indiscriminately consumed. Bolder bands attacked mills and destroyed the machinery; and all threshing machines, in particular, were condemned. Threatening letters were circulated, demanding the raising of wages or the disuse of machinery; and the nightly exploits of the writer, insured attention to their demands. These disorders began in Kent almost before its harvest was over; and during October, November, and December extended into the counties of Hants, Wilts, Bucks, Sussex, and Surrey. Throughout the whole of this district, all protection for property seemed at an end. Bands of rioters pillaged and destroyed during the day; and so soon as night fell, simultaneous conflagrations, starting up in different quarters, spread over the country havoc and dismay. The military force in the disturbed counties was increased; a proclamation was issued offering a reward of 500*l.* for the conviction of any person concerned in fire-raising, and special commissions were appointed to proceed into the shires where the outrages had been committed.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Carlotta Joachima, queen-dowager of Portugal, 53; daughter of Charles IV., of Spain; married in 1790 to the late John VI. In a duel, in Battersea Fields, Oliver Clayton, author of several pamphlets and of "Ten Miles round London." W. Eyton Tooker, B.A., 24, a member of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge: over-exertion in literary pursuits is supposed to have produced a morbid state of the brain, which terminated in madness. Theodosia Beauchamp, wife of Barry O'Meara, medical attendant on Napoleon at St. Helena. She was the only daughter of Sir E. Boughton, and married, for her first husband, in 1777, captain Donellan, who was hung at Warwick, April 4, 1781, for having, in the hope of inheriting the fortune, poisoned his wife's only brother, sir T. E. A. Boughton. This he effected by prussic acid distilled from laurel leaves, which he contrived should be administered, in lieu of medicine, by the mother of his victim. Inheriting the fortune her first husband had thus procured, her second husband was Sir E. Leigh, (Ann. Reg. lxxii., 250.) He died at Bath in 1818, and in 1823, she married Mr. O'Meara. At his lodgings, in Hanover-street, by suicide, lord Graves, 54, commissioner of excise: he had lived separate from lady Graves some time, and some rumour, not creditable to her ladyship, had a fatal termination. At Paris, M. Benjamin Constant, 63, celebrated political writer and member of the chamber of deputies. Nathaniel Brassey Halhed, 79, eminent orientalist and author of several learned works, illustrative of Hindoo history and literature. Mr. Halhed obtained a seat in the house of commons, and exhibited a melancholy instance of mental delusion in his persevering patronage of the prophet Brothers, whose confinement in Bedlam he denounced as tyrannical, and, at the same time, wrote a book to vindicate the reveries of the crazy enthusiast. At Paris, Marshal Gouvion St. Cyr, 66, author of "Memoirs of the Italian Wars." Lady Augusta de Ameland, fourth daughter to the earl of Dunmore; married at Rome, in 1793, to the duke of Sussex, which ceremony was repeated in England, but void by the Royal Marriage Act. A son, Augustus D'Este, and a daughter by his royal mistress, survived her ladyship. At Perugia, in Italy, Hippolyto Bendo, 124; abstemious in eating, but drank regularly six bottles of wine per day. At Paris, F. A. Winsor, 67, founder of the gas-light and coke company in London and of the first gas company established in Paris. At Camberwell, Samuel Favell, 70, many years an active and useful member of the common council of London. At St. Leu, Louis Henry de Bourbon, prince of Condé, 75; the prince terminated his existence by hanging himself, under the excitement produced by the July revolution. He bequeathed property to the amount of fifteen millions of francs to the baroness of Feuchères an Englishwoman, with whom he lived. The rest of his immense wealth was left to the duke d'Aumale, third son of the king of the French. In Finsbury, John Milward, 95, many years an active magistrate of Middlesex. He left 75,000*l.* to various charities of the metropolis, and the residue of his property to the London Hospital. James Humphrey, eminent lawyer and juridical writer; author of "Observations on the English Law of Real Property," a work that drew much attention. John Crowder, 74, alderman of London and part proprietor of the Public Ledger, newspaper. Lord Henley, 78, diplomatist. At Paris, countess de Genlis, 84, a French lady of great literary celebrity. She was governess to the children of the duke de Chartres, with whom a liaison is reported to have subsisted. The duke was father to Louis Philip. Sir Thomas Lawrence, 71, celebrated portrait painter. The professional income of this popular artist was estimated at from 10,000*l.* to 15,000*l.* a-year, notwithstanding which, he died in embarrassed circumstances, chiefly from his profuse expenditure in the purchase of scarce and valuable works of art. John Mitford, Baron Redesdale, 82, late lord chancellor of Ireland; an able lawyer and legal writer.

A. D. 1831. Jan. SPECIAL COMMISSIONS. —The two special commissions appointed at the close of the past year to try the rioters and incendiaries, completed in the present month their painful duty. On the 9th, judgment of death was recorded against 23 prisoners for the destruction of a paper-machine in Buckinghamshire; in Dorset, on the 11th, against 3 for extorting money and two for robbery; at Norwich, 45 persons were convicted of machine-breaking and rioting; at Ipswich, 3 for extorting money; at Petworth, 26 for machine-breaking and rioting; at Gloucester, upwards of 30; at Oxford, 29; and at Winchester, out of 40 convicted, six were left for execution, of whom, however, only two were executed. At Salisbury, 44 prisoners were convicted, of whom two were executed on the 25th. Altogether, upwards of 800 offenders were tried; and all of those convicted were, with the exception of the four executed, sentenced to various terms of transportation and imprisonment. The prosecutions were firmly but discreetly conducted; and they checked the outrages against property, especially in the southern counties.

10. Trial and conviction of Richard Carlile for a libel, tending to excite the agricultural labourers to riot and the destruction of property. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the Compter, to pay a fine of 200*l.*, and to find sureties to keep the peace for ten years.

12. The cholera morbus, which had been fatally prevalent at Moscow, extended to St. Petersburg.

Feb. 1. At the anniversary meeting of the Birmingham political union. Mr. Attwood stated that the union had now on its books 9000 individuals paying from 4*s.* to 2*l.* 2*s.* each.

3. Parliament re-assembled. Earl Grey, in the lords, and Viscount Althorp, in the commons, announced that a plan of parliamentary reform had been agreed upon by ministers, which would be introduced by lord John Russell.

Duke of Nemours elected king of Belgium. The French king refusing his consent, lest the jealousy of other powers might be excited, the election became void.

7. The New Testament presented to the king, at Brighton, painted in gold, on porcelain paper, and, for the first time, successfully executed on both sides.

9. A meeting of the subscribers to a fund to erect a monument to the memory of the celebrated John Locke. The subscription had been open since 1806, and amounted only to 846*l.*; which being insufficient to defray the expense of a monument in St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey, it was resolved to erect one in the London University.

11. Lord Althorp brought forward the Budget. It was proposed to abolish 210 places. The taxes on tobacco, newspapers, and advertisements to be reduced; those on coals, candles, printed cottons, and other articles, abolished. Reductions estimated at 4,080,000*l.*; the new duties to be imposed at 2,740,000*l.* It was proposed to tax the transfer of funded property and passengers by steam-boats, but these propositions were abandoned.

12. Messrs. O'Connell, Steele, and Barrett pleaded guilty to fourteen counts of an indictment, charging them with holding political meetings contrary to the proclamation of the lord lieutenant. The act under which they were convicted expired, pending the general election of this year, before they were called up for judgment, so that they escaped punishment.

19. St. John Long, against whom a verdict of manslaughter had been returned by a coroner's jury in the case of Mrs. Lloyd, whose death was alleged to have been caused by his medical practice, was tried and acquitted at the Old Bailey. His mode of treatment was by rubbing and unction.

20. Battle of Grochow, near Warsaw, between the Poles and Russians. The conflict was most obstinate; the Russians losing 7000, the Poles 2000 men.

22. New election law introduced into the French chamber of deputies. By this law the elective qualification is reduced from 300 to 240 francs, paid in direct taxes, and that of eligibility to the rank of deputy, from 1000 to 500 francs. This alteration, it is calculated, will augment the number of electors to 210,000.

Mar. 1. INTRODUCTION OF THE REFORM BILL.—This important measure was looked forward to with intense interest. It was introduced by lord John Russell in a speech remarkable for accuracy and research. He said the grievances in parliamentary representation, of which the people chiefly complained, were three: first, the nomination of members by individuals; secondly, elections by close corporations; and thirdly, the expense of elections. It was proposed to meet the first grievance by the disfranchisement of boroughs; 60 boroughs, not having a population of 2000 were to be totally disfranchised; and 47 boroughs, with a population of only 4000, the members returned by each to be reduced to one. Weymouth, which sent four members, was to send two. This would reduce the number of members 168; part of which vacancies were to be supplied by giving representatives to large towns, and by increasing the number of county members. In boroughs, the elective franchise to be extended to householders paying a 10*l.* rent; in counties, to copyholders of 10*l.* a-year, and leaseholders of 50*l.* per annum. Persons already in possession of the right of voting not to be deprived, if actually resident. For lessening the expenses of elections, non-resident electors to be disfranchised, and the duration of elections to be shortened by increasing the facilities for taking the poll. No compensation to be given to the proprietors of the disfranchised boroughs; which was justified under the precedent of the forty-shilling freeholders of Ireland, who had received no compensation for the loss of their votes. As to the duration of parliaments, his lordship seemed favourable to shortening them, but reserved that branch of reform to a future and separate occasion. He expressed doubts of the expediency of voting by ballot, and concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill for amending the representation in England and Wales. The bill was read a first time without a division, after an animated discussion that lasted seven days. The second reading was carried on the 22nd, after a debate of two days, by a majority of ONE; the numbers being 302 to 301. The chief objections against the bill were, that it reduced the number of the house of commons; that it was founded on the basis of population, without reference to property or the payment of taxes; and that it was a robbery of corporations, revolutionary and subversive of the constitution. On the commitment, April 13th, general Gascoyne moved that the number of members ought not to be diminished. For the motion 299, against it 291. Majority against ministers 8. Three days after, ministers were again defeated by 164 to 142, upon a question of adjournment, by which the voting of supplies was postponed. Ministers then tendered the resignation of their offices to the king, which he declined to accept. They next recommended that parliament should be dissolved, to which his majesty assented and promptly executed. In the two protracted discussions on the Reform Bill, the chief speakers for the measure were,—lord Althorp, Hume, Macauley, Shiel, lord Morpeth, Gisborne, E. G. S. Stanley, Wyse, sir James Graham, D. O'Connell, Dr. Lushington, lord Ebrington, Hobhouse, lord

Tavistock, lord Palmerston, Tennyson, lord Howick, R. Grant, Harvey, J. Wood, lord Stanley, alderman Waithman, T. Duncombe, H. L. Bulwer, C. Grant, W. Cavendish, Mies, J. Campbell, C. Fergusson, sir T. Dehman, and sir W. Horne; against,—sir R. Inglis, H. Twiss, lord Gower, sir Charles Wetherell, viscount Mahon, Baron Darlington, C. Wynne, H. Davies, sir R. Peel, col. Sibthorpe, sir G. Clerk, Lyndall, North, W. Y. Peel, Bethell, Praed, M. Attwood, sir J. Yorke, Goulburn, Courtenay, Croker, Calcraft, G. Banks, K. Douglas, serg. Lefroy, sir G. Warren, Cartwright, sir R. Vyvyan, V. Stuart, sir E. Sugden, lord Valletort, sir J. Shelley, Shaw, sir James Scarlett, sir T. Acland, general Gascoyne, Sadler, lord Stormont, sir R. Wilson, and S. G. Price.

10. Entry of the Austrian troops into Modena for the purpose of suppressing the insurrection there. They subsequently took possession of other revolted places, and succeeded in restoring the authorities that had been deposed.

13. M. Lafitte and most of his colleagues resigned: the former succeeded by M. Casimir Perier. Sebastiani and Soult retained their places at the head of the foreign and war departments. A more firm resistance to the movement party was the anticipated policy of the new ministry.

31. The Russians defeated at Wawz, with the loss of 14,000 men, after a battle of two days, by the Poles under general Skrzynecki. Loss of the Poles inconsiderable.

April 7. Revolution in Brazil. The emperor, Don Pedro, abdicated in favour of his son, Don Pedro II., a child five years old, and embarked with the rest of his family on board a British ship of war. A regency was appointed to act in the name of the young emperor. Jealousy of the constitutionalists, whom the emperor had patronised, and who had arrived in great number in Brazil, after the triumph of his brother Miguel over the emperor's daughter, Donna Maria, queen of Portugal, was the chief cause of the discontents of the Brazilians. The military joined the natives in their defection.

7. Miss Foote, the popular actress, married to the earl of Harrington.

22. Parliament prorogued by the king, and the next day dissolved. His majesty said he had determined on this step, to take the sense of the people on a change in the representation. The anti-reformers deprecated dissolution, and a tumultuous altercation between them and their opponents was only interrupted by the sudden arrival of the king. London and most other towns were illuminated in consequence, and the windows of the lords Wellington and Londerry, sir R. Peel, sir Robert Wilson, and others opposed to the reform bill, were broken by the populace. During the six months' duration of the Wellington parliament, the chief measures that had been completed were the repeal of taxes and the settlement of the civil list. The last was fixed at 510,000*l.*, which reduction was effected by transferring the charges unconnected with the royal maintenance and dignity to the other departments of the public expenditure. The civil list pensions were limited to 75,000*l.* An addition of 7,680 men was made to the army, and 3,000 to the navy. These augmentations were rendered necessary by the disturbed state of the agricultural districts, and the agitation in Ireland.

23. Duke William of Brunswick assumes the sovereignty, with the consent of the king of England and the German Diet, owing to the incapacity of his brother.

30. A Polish corps, under Dwernicki, being hard pressed by the Russians, retreated into Austrian Galicia, and, surrendering to the Austrian authorities, were treated as prisoners and sent into Hungary.

May 4. A British fleet appearing in the Tagus obtains the redress of certain grievances, which, before its arrival, had been refused by the Portuguese government.

6. At a review of the second regiment of life guards in Windsor Park, the king presented them with a pair of silver kettle-drums, weighing 1900 ounces. It is the first royal donation of the kind since George III. presented, in 1789, kettle-drums of silver to the Blues.

10. Certain districts of the counties of Clare, Galway, Roscommon, and Tipperary proclaimed in a state of disturbance. Large bodies had for some time assembled to turn up pasture land for the alleged purpose of creating employment.

13. 1Key Solomons, a notorious thief and receiver of stolen goods, sentenced at the Old Bailey to 14 years' transportation.

26. The subscriptions raised in England to relieve distress in Ireland amount to 60,000*l.*, independent of the assistance afforded by government.

28. A coroner's inquest which had been sitting for some days on the bodies of several persons who had been killed in an affray with the police, at Castlepollard, in Ireland, returned a verdict against the chief constable, and 18 of the police, of having caused the death of the said persons, by firing at them. The grand jury subsequently ignored the bills preferred against them for murder, and the relations refusing to proceed against them for manslaughter, the prosecution was abandoned.

GENERAL ELECTION.—An appeal having been made to the people, the greatest excitement prevailed during the elections.

The reform bill was considered the king's measure as well as that of his ministers, and for the time the country was divided into two parties; those in favour of the bill and those against it: the former constituted an overwhelming majority of the nation, comprising a union of all the different classes of parliamentary reformers, who joined, during the elections, in one common rallying cry of "The bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill." In Ireland, two pledged supporters of the bill were elected for Dublin. Scotland became unusually agitated, and Mr. Jeffrey, the lord advocate, was returned amidst much tumult for Edinburgh. In England, the anti-billmen were signally defeated. Mr. Banks was rejected in Dorsetshire; Sir R. Vyvyan in Cornwall; sir E. Knatchbull in Kent; sir T. Acland in Devonshire. In the city of London, all the four members were pledged to support the bill. Out of the eighty-two county members for England, all were pledged to the bill, with the exception of about half-a-dozen returned by the counties of Westmoreland, Bucks, Salop, Huntingdon, and Monmouth. The opponents to the ministerial measure stood nowhere with vigour, except in the universities, where the church authority predominates; and popular enthusiasm proved more than a match for the anti-bill proprietors of boroughs, even in the existing defective state of parliamentary representation.

June 3. Paganini, the celebrated violin-player, gave his first concert at the Opera House with great success.

4. Prince Leopold elected king of Belgium by the congress at Brussels.

Disturbances among the workmen employed in the iron works at Merthyr Tydvil, owing to low wages and the high price of provisions. The riot act being read, instead of dispersing, they made an attack on the military, who firing, several of the rioters were killed and wounded.

6. Duncan McCraig, a minister of the Scottish church, convicted at Edinburgh of stealing books, and sentenced to be transported for 14 years.

7. The Old Boar's Head, in Great East Cheap, the scene of many of Shakespeare's stories, removed, to make way for the approaches to the New London Bridge.

8. Upwards of 3,000 men assembled to destroy the enclosures in the forest of Dean, under a mistaken notion that every 21 years they had a right to level them; the rioters succeeded in destroying fifty miles of wall and fences, and throwing open 10,000 acres of plantation.

10. Proclamation in the Gazette requiring all vessels coming from the Baltic to perform quarantine, owing to the prevalence of the cholera morbus in Russia and adjacent parts.

13. Sailed from the London Docks for Canada, with their wives and families, 300 Chelsea pensioners; they had received four years' pay and grants of land from the British government. There were, also, along with them, several passengers going out at the expense of their parishes, and mechanics and tradesmen paying their own passage.

14. NEW PARLIAMENT met and re-elected C. M. Sutton, speaker. It was opened by the king, in person, on the 21st. He recommended to their consideration the expediency of a reform in the representation; announced the continuance of amicable relations with foreign powers; the settlement of the affairs of Belgium; and adverted to disturbances in Ireland, and the cholera morbus in Russia. Addresses were agreed to in both houses without a division.

18. At Newtonbarry in Ireland, in a seizure for tithes, thirty-five persons killed or severely wounded by the yeomanry, who began firing on the multitude without orders. A coroner's jury, which sat on the dead, was discharged without giving a verdict.

22. Two young men found drowned in the Serpentine. One was a gentleman, the other a pickpocket, in whose pockets were found a coral necklace, 26 handkerchiefs, a pocket book, and 26 pawnbrokers' duplicates. The pickpocket fell a victim to his humanity—so inconsistent is human nature—by diving after the other sufferer, with a view to save him.

24. REFORM BILL.—Lord John Russell a second time obtained leave to introduce this measure, and adverted to the opinions of Chatham, Pitt, and Fox, in favour of improving the representative system. To afford time to bring forward the reform bills for Scotland and Ireland, the second reading was deferred to July 4th, when an elaborate debate ensued, in which sir James Macintosh, Macauley, sir R. Peel, the Bulwers, lord Althorp, Wm. Brougham, and sir F. Burdett shone conspicuous. It continued three nights, ending on the third, and the house dividing, 367 for the second reading, 231 against it; majority, 136 in favour of the bill. It was next committed and underwent a long, severe, but beneficial scrutiny; every clause was carefully discussed as it arose; imperfections were discovered, acknowledged and remedied: these occupied the house almost uninterruptedly till the 19th September, when on the third reading there was another eloquent display of three nights, in which sir James Scarlett, Macauley, Croker, J.

Williams, C. Wynn, Crampton, and Pemberton mingled. The house divided—for the bill, 345; against it, 236; majority, 109. The bill then passed the commons amid loud cheers, and next day was taken up to the lords by upwards of 100 members, headed by lords Althorp and Russell.

29. Common council of London withdrew their objection to the admission of Jews to the freedom of the city.

July 4. Robert Taylor found guilty of blasphemy after a twelve hours' trial. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the county gaol of Surrey, and to pay a fine of 200*l*.

7. Mr. Cobbett tried for a libel in his Political Register, the tendency of which, it was alleged, was to excite the peasantry to the destruction of property. After the jury had been locked up fifteen hours they were discharged by the judge, as there was no likelihood of agreeing in their verdict.

11. Portuguese government having refused satisfaction for injuries committed on French subjects by the Portuguese authorities, the passage of the Tagus was forced by admiral Roussin, and the Portuguese fleet, lying off Lisbon, taken possession of. This compelled the court of Lisbon to submit to the terms dictated by the French, which included the dismissal of some Portuguese functionaries, an indemnity for expenses incurred by the expedition, the reversal of all sentences pronounced against Frenchmen for political opinions, and the publication of these humiliating terms in the Lisbon Gazette.

14. At Winchester, Mr. Deacle recovers 50*l*. damages against Messrs. Bingham Baring and Francis Baring, magistrates, for false imprisonment.

16. Hon. W. L. Wellesley committed by the Lord Chancellor for contempt of court, in having withdrawn his daughter from the custody of the persons appointed by the Court of Chancery.—(See p. 827.) Mr. Wellesley, after having remained several days in confinement, submitted to the court, and, having restored his daughter, was discharged.

19. After the erection of major Cartwright's statue in Burton Crescent, nearly 600 of his admirers dined at the White Conduit House. Sir F. Burdett and Mr. O'Connell were present, and Mr. Hume in the chair.

Aug. 1. Opening of New London Bridge; the king and queen attended the ceremony, going by water in state. An elegant pavilion was erected on the bridge, in which a splendid banquet was prepared for their majesties and other guests. The time occupied in the erection of this masterly structure, from the driving of the first pile, had been seven years, five months, and thirteen days. The fall of water at the ebbing of the tide, which was formerly so dangerous, has been completely remedied by the increased waterway afforded by the removal of the cumbrous piers of the old bridge.

2. Awful fire at Pera, a suburb of Constantinople, in which the hotels of the foreign embassies, with a number of churches and 5000 houses, fell a prey to the flames.

12. The Dutch recommenced hostilities against the Belgians, and, attacking them at Louvaine, compelled them, under the command of king Leopold, to retreat. The advance of a French army towards Brussels deterred the Hollanders from pursuing their victory.

17. Rothsay Castle, steam-boat, plying between Liverpool and Beaumaris, wrecked in the night with nearly 200 passengers and crew on board, of whom only 22 were saved. The captain and mate seem to have been intoxicated and the vessel not seaworthy.

19. A bronze statue erected in Hanover-square to the memory of the late Mr. Pitt, on a pedestal of granite: the statue is ten feet high and weighs four tons. Mr. Chantrey is the sculptor.

Sept. 7. After two days' hard fighting, Warsaw capitulated and was taken possession of by the Russians.

8. Coronation of their majesties. There was a royal procession from St. James's palace to Westminster Abbey, but there was no banquet in Westminster Hall. A grand dinner given at St. James's. In the evening the illuminations in the metropolis were splendid and general; the theatres, Vauxhall Gardens, and many places of public entertainment were open free of expense, and a display of fire-works took place in Hyde Park, which attracted an immense concourse of spectators.

21. The copyright of sir Walter Scott's miscellaneous prose-works, which comprise six volumes 8vo., sold by auction for 240*l*. The manuscripts of the Waverley novels had been previously sold at Evans's. The Monastery, bound in green morocco, brought 18*l*.; the Antiquary, 42*l*.; Rob Roy, 50*l*.

Oct. 7. REFORM BILL REJECTED BY THE LORDS.—Earl Grey moved the second reading of the bill on the 3rd. In opening the measure to their lordships, he appeared deeply affected by the weight of personal responsibility it imposed upon him. He said the great object of his political life had been parliamentary reform; but if the present measure had the revolutionary tendency some imputed to it, he would not defend, much less propose it. He next traced the growth of the spirit of reform; its present irresistible power; affirmed that the representative franchise was not a property but a trust which had been perverted; expressed his attachment to the church and its ministers; and, after describing and defending the leading points of the bill, concluded with declaring that ministers were resolved to stand or fall by the present measure. Loud cheers followed the close of his lordship's address. After which lord Wharncliffe rose. He did not defend the nomination boroughs, but described portions of the bill as hurtful to the agricultural interest and subversive of the power of the crown and the lords. He concluded by moving an amendment, "That this bill be rejected;" which, being considered unnecessarily offensive it was altered,—“That it be read this day six months.” The amendment having been seconded and put from the woolsack, one of the most memorable discussions in parliamentary history followed. For skill, force, and variety of argument; for historical, constitutional, and scholastic illustration, it was never surpassed. That some reform was necessary appeared to be generally conceded, and both sides of the noble assembly maintained their opinions with the dignified consciousness of rectitude of intention, and the most laudable patience and temper. Besides Grey and Wharncliffe, the chief speakers for the bill were.—Brougham, Lansdowne, Melbourne, Holland, Mulgrave, Plunkett, Richmond, Roseberry, Radnor, Goderich, and the duke of Sussex; against,—Harrowby, Wellington, Dudley, Carnarvon, Eldon, Buckingham, Mansfield, Bute, Winchelsea, Haddington, Londonderry, Tenterden, Falmouth, Lyndhurst, Wynford, Harewood, the duke of Gloucester, and the archbishop of Canterbury. The debate, which began on Monday, was continued for five nights, and only closed about five o'clock on Saturday morning; when the house divided—contents 158; non-contents 199; majority against the bill 41. Of this majority, 21 were contributed by the bench of bishops. The bill being thus thrown out, the question—what will the lords do?—which had been earnestly and anxiously asked during the preceding months, was answered. It produced a strong and indignant feeling through the country. Some of the London newspapers were arrayed in mourning, and several noble lords who had opposed the bill were assailed by the populace. At Derby they broke open the town gaol, and demolished the property of the anti-reformers of the place. At Nottingham there was considerable rioting, which ended in the destruction, by fire, of the ancient castle there, the property of the duke of Newcastle. His grace had become unpopular, and unintentionally given a great impulse to reform by his hasty declaration, in respect of his dependant voters, at Newark, that he had “a right to do what he pleased with his own.” These excesses and a few burnings in effigy were the first outbreaks of popular rage; but, in general, there was confidence in the ultimate success of the bill, and a disposition on the part of the people and the political societies, now in action, to support the government and preserve the peace.

9. ASSASSINATION OF CAPO D'ISTRIAS.

—This outrage was committed as the president of Greece was entering the church of Napoli di Romania, by two sons of the old Greek bey Mavromichali, in revenge for the humiliation of their family by the arbitrary assumption of power by Capo D'Istrias. The president had been in authority since 1827, and his first measures had been popular, tending to the peace and improvement of the country. Latterly he had manifested a disposition to establish a perpetual dictatorship, under the auspices of Russia. He abolished the popular form of government, and established a council called the Panhellenium, which was wholly under his control. All the constitutionalists, who had risked life and property in the protracted struggle with the Turks, were excluded from his confidence. When the deputies waited upon him to propose calling a national assembly, in order to establish a free government, he told them they were not fit for liberty. Of this last, the Greeks had unhappily given too many proofs, but, though unfit for liberal institutions, they merited a better form of rule than a naked despotism, supported by foreign influence, and for the sole benefit of the count and his own servile adherents.

10. FRENCH HEREDITARY PEERAGE.

—A reform of the chamber of peers by the abrogation of hereditary peerage, and the appointment of a senate for life, the members of which should possess, from their personal characters, a solid claim to the public confidence, was a leading object with the French nation. A measure for this purpose was carried in the chamber of deputies on the 10th, by a majority of 324 to 86; and, to facilitate its progress in the upper chamber, upwards of thirty new peerages were created. In the following January the peerage law was promulgated with the royal sanction. In it was contained a classification of the persons to whom the king's choice was to be restricted in the future creating of peers, accompanied by a provision that no allowance or pension shall be attached to the dignity, as formerly was too frequent, for its support,

All future peers must, therefore, have distinguished themselves in a military, legal, administrative, or commercial career, to entitle them to such honour; from which the needy favourites of the court and disgraced ministers are excluded.

16. Disturbance in the chapel of the Rev. E. Irving, near Gray's Inn-lane, occasioned by a Miss Hall holding forth in what was denominated an "unknown tongue." She was removed to the vestry. In the afternoon, Mr. Irving regretted that he had not suffered her to proceed in her mystic prophecies in the body of the temple. On this a schoolmaster rose, and commenced, in the same unknown gibberish, soothsaying. A scene of confusion ensued, the whole congregation rising from their seats in affright, while Mr. Irving listened with great composure to these unintelligible outpourings of the spirit.

20. Parliament prorogued by the king, who intimated the necessity of resuming in the ensuing session the subject of a constitutional reform in the house of commons. Besides the discussion of this vital question, bills had been passed for legalising the sale of corn by weight, in lieu of measure; for allowing the sale of game; and lord chancellor Brougham's important act, establishing the Bankruptcy Court, was passed.

21. The Asiatic cholera having extended its ravages from Moscow to Hamburgh, the London Gazette contained precautions to be adopted against the spread of this dreadful pestilence. The establishment of a Board of Health in every town, to correspond with the board in London, and to consist of magistrates, clergy, and two or three of the faculty of medicine; large towns to be divided into districts, with committees of inspection. Cleanliness and free ventilation were strongly recommended; the immediate burning of old rags, paper, cordage, clothes, hangings, &c.; copious use of soap and water to furniture, clothes, and person; chloride of lime and water to drains and sinks, &c.; hot lime-wash to the walls and roofs; and every particle of filth to be carefully removed.

29. RIOTS IN BRISTOL.—This city suddenly became the scene of dreadful excesses on the public entrance of sir Charles Wetherell, the recorder. Sir Charles had been a strenuous opponent, in the house of commons, of the reform bill. The riots began on Saturday, continued through the whole of Sunday, and were only got under on Monday morning, when the corporation, the military, and the citizens awoke from the stupor into which they appear to have been thrown by this unexpected outbreak of popular fury. The whole of Bristol was on the verge of destruction; the mansion-house, custom-house, excise-office, and bishop's palace, were plundered and set on fire; the toll-gates pulled down; the prisons burst open with sledge hammers, and their inmates, criminals and debtors, set at liberty amidst the exulting shouts of the populace. During the whole of Sunday the mob were the unresisted masters of the city. Forty-two offices, dwelling-houses, and warehouses were completely destroyed, exclusive of public buildings. The loss of property was estimated at half a million. The number of rioters killed, wounded or injured, was about 110. Of about 14 or 16 who lost their lives, three died from the shots or sword-cuts of the military; the rest were mostly the victims of excessive drinking, in the rifled cellars and warehouses, which produced either apoplexy upon the spot, or disabled them from escaping from the flames that they had themselves kindled.

31. Meeting of the London Political Union at the Crown and Anchor, and, by adjournment, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, Sir F. Burdett in the chair. It was agreed to form a national union with branch societies, each having a delegate at the central council. At a subsequent meeting, some discord arose on a proposal that part of the council should consist of representatives from the working-classes. The chairman opposed this, because it assumed a distinction of classes to exist, having separate interests. The proposal, however, was adopted; after this, and on the alleged ground of an appearance of permanency in the union, sir Francis withdrew his name from the association. A resolution was proposed in favour of universal suffrage, which not being supported by the middle class, the work-people formed a political union among themselves.

Nov. 2. Numerous incendiary fires between this and the 9th, in Cheshire, Yorkshire, and Somersetshire.

4. Several cases of the spasmodic cholera at Sunderland: this was the first appearance of the disease in this country, and is supposed to have been brought from Hamburgh by persons who had been permitted to evade the quarantine establishment at Sunderland.

7. Meeting of the political union of the working-classes at White Conduit House, Thomas Wakley, chairman, postponed. The notice convening this assembly, besides demanding universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and annual parliaments, declared, "That all property, honestly acquired, is sacred and inviolable; that all men are born equally free and have certain natural and inalienable rights; that all hereditary distinctions of birth are unnatural and opposed to the equal rights of man, and ought to be abolished;" and they further declared that they would never be satisfied with any law that stopped short of these principles. An intimation from the police magistrates and from lord Melbourne, that a meeting for these objects was not only illegal and seditious, but, perhaps, treasonable, led to its abandonment.

21. Proclamation issued declaring certain affiliated political unions unlawful, and cautioning persons against entering into such combinations.

DISTURBANCES AT LYONS.—This great seat of the French silk manufacture became the scene of a terrible commotion. It arose in a dispute on wages; the work-people demanding higher wages than their employers, in the existing depression of the trade, thought they could afford. On the morning of the 21st, the weavers rose in arms, and defeated and disarmed the national guards, and troops of the line marched against them. The workmen in all parts of the town co-operated in the insurrectionary movement by unpaving the streets, raising barricades, and firing on the military from the windows. Overpowering all resistance, the soldiery were entirely driven out of the city, and compelled, under general Roguet, to retire to the heights of Montessuy. Here they waited the arrival of the duke of Orleans and marshal Soult, the ministr of war, with reinforcements. The insurgents, sensible that their triumph must be short, conducted themselves with moderation and prudence; took precautions for the protection of property, and invited the deposed civic authorities to return to the city; denying all political motives, and simply demanding such regulations as would secure their bread. A subscription was opened, and the municipal council voted 150,000 francs for the immediate relief of the distressed workmen, and the succour of the wounded. The killed, on both sides, during the bloody conflicts in the streets, was estimated at 500 or 600. Marshal Soult entered Lyons at the head of 26,000 men, disgraced some of the military who had misbehaved, disbanded the national guard, and abolished the tariff of wages, leaving the weavers and their employers to settle the price of labour, without the intervention of the civil power, by free competition.

22. The Birmingham association abandon their intended plan of organization in consequence of the royal proclamation.

Dec. 2. Trial and conviction of Bishop, Williams, and May, at the Old Bailey, for the murder of an Italian boy; May's sentence was commuted for transportation for life, the other wretches were executed. They had long been resurrectionists but had left the practice of exhuming the dead for the purpose of decoying the living into Bishop's house, where they first administered laudanum to them in rum, and then, in a state of insensibility, suspended their victim by the heels in a well of water, till life was extinct. The bodies were sold to the hospitals for anatomical purposes.

4. Executed at Malaga, with forty-two companions, with whom he had landed there, hoping from the treacherous promises of the governor, Moreno, to effect a successful insurrection against Ferdinand, general Torrijos, the Spanish constitutional leader. Mr. Boyd, an English merchant, was among the sufferers. Subscriptions were subsequently raised for the widow of Torrijos both in this and other countries.

6. PARLIAMENT opened by the king. The royal speech recommended the settlement of the reform question; referred to the opposition made to the payment of tithes in Ireland; announced the conclusion of a convention with France for the suppression of the African slave-trade; alluded to the existence of political combinations in England; deplored the excesses at Bristol, and recommended improvements in the municipal police of the kingdom. Addresses in both houses were agreed to without a division.

A suit, to nullify the will of the duke of Bourbon, (see p. 901,) has been instituted in Paris by the princes de Rohan, the heirs of the deceased; it being alleged that the will, which went to bequeath immense wealth to the family of the French king and the baroness de Feuchères, mistress of the superannuated duke, had been procured by improper means, and that the duke had come unfairly by his death. The trial was long, and excited great interest. pending the discussion on the civil list of Louis Philip, but terminated on the 6th in the confirmation of the disputed testament.

12. THIRD INTRODUCTION OF THE REFORM BILL.—Lord John Russell, in introducing for the third time the parliamentary reform bill, said that government was pledged not to propose a bill less efficient than the former. He then noticed the alterations introduced into the new measure. The censuses of 1821 and 1831 had been objected to, as the basis of borough disfranchisement; instead of population, the number of houses, combined with their value, as rated to the assessed taxes, had been substituted as a better criterion of their importance. The right of voting in boroughs to be determined, not by a 10% poor-rate, which was an uncertain test, but by the occupying a rated tenement of the annual value of 10%. The effect of these and other alterations was to lessen the number of the boroughs to be disfranchised, and the full complement of 658 members would be maintained. Sir Robert Peel considered these concessions as improvements: the bill was read a first time, and on the 10th a second, after a two days' debate, protracted to one o'clock on Sunday morning. For the second reading, 324; against it, 162; majority 162. House adjourned till after Christmas.

17. Earl of Mar sentenced to two months' imprisonment, at Edinburgh, for shooting at Mr. Oldham, a clergyman. Dispute arose in sporting.

22. Insurrection among the Blacks in Jamaica; martial law proclaimed.

SUICIDES IN PARIS.—A writer in the Annales d'Hygiène, who has examined about 9,000 judicial inquests in Paris, from 1796 to 1830, thinks himself warranted in assuming,—1. That philosophical or premeditated suicide takes place in the night, or a little before day-break. 2. That accidental or unpremeditated suicide takes place during the day; because it is then that the occasional causes occur, such as quarrels, bad news, losses at play, intemperance, &c. At every age, man chooses a particular mode of committing suicide. In youth, he has recourse to hanging, which he soon abandons for fire-arms: in proportion as his vigour declines, he returns to his former mode; and it is most commonly by hanging that the old man perishes, who puts an end to his existence.

IRELAND.—The removal of Catholic disabilities has failed to produce tranquillity, or alleviate the miseries of the population. Tithe-conflicts between the peasantry and police have become unusually murderous this year, and armed bands traversed the country waging war against oppressive landlords and low-priced labour. Popular discontents were augmented by the partial failure of the potato crop, which left thousands without food or the means of obtaining it. While such elements of exasperation existed, it was vain to expect political agitation to cease, and it was kept up with more ardour than ever, by the Dublin orators. "If the Union," said Mr. Sheil, "is not repealed within two years, I am determined that I will pay neither rent, tithes, nor taxes. They may distract my goods, but who'll buy?" (Ann. Reg. lxxiii. 310.) Between Mr. O'Connell and the lord lieutenant there were unceasing hostilities, one fulminating his proclamations against political meetings, the other seeking to evade them by new forms of agitation. Defeated in his scheme of a procession of the Trades, he summoned his assemblies under new names—a public breakfast, or a district or parish meeting; all of which were successively prohibited by the viceroy. Unable to elude the 'Algerine act,' as Mr. O'Connell termed the law under which he was pursued, abstinence from taxed articles, and a partial run on the banks were attempted; but neither proved effective, a scarcity of money being not less inconvenient than non-consumption to the farmers who had produce to sell in the Irish markets. After many contrivances, the wily agitator was caught in the toils of the law, which, however, he escaped, as already mentioned, though he pleaded guilty to the indictment found against him.

FRANCE.—The violent convulsion of the past year continued its heavings. Louis Philip acted with judgment and firmness, and by a tour through the provinces and other conciliatory acts, sought to establish himself in the confidence of the nation. The new election law, the reduction of the king's civil list to one-third the amount of that of his predecessor, and the abolition of the hereditary peerage, however, failed to satisfy the popular demands. France was divided into three parties. First, the adherents of a constitutional monarchy and advocates of peace; among whom were the citizen king, his ministry, a majority of the legislature, and the intelligent and moderate of the community. The second was the movement party, consisting of extreme republicans, eager for war, for the emancipation of Poland and Italy, and the annexation of Belgium to France, in defiance of the existing treaties, and reckless of the consequences of such hazardous foreign interventions. The last and smallest party was that of the Carlists or friends of the ex-king, consisting of some of the old nobility, the priests, and those under their influence. The strength of the government was in the middle class, embodied in the national guard. As a precaution against the Buonapartists and Bourbonists, a law was passed, banishing from France the families of Napoleon and Charles X.

POLAND.—This year saw the insurrection of Poland against the domination of Russia brought to a close. The heads of the insurrection had not at first declared any intention of throwing off all subjection to the Russian autocrat; they had demanded only the preservation of the national rights, and the independence of the separate constitution under the sovereignty of the emperor, which had been guaranteed to them by the Congress of Vienna. But the emperor refused to treat with them, unless they would first unconditionally submit to his authority. As more humiliating terms could not be dictated to them after being defeated in battle, the Poles resolved to try the fortune of war. The struggle was nobly maintained, and they were bravely and skilfully commanded by their successive leaders, Chłopicki, Radziwiłł and Skrzynecki. But the locality of the insurrection was too circumscribed; it did not spread with enthusiasm in the provinces, and the heroic Poles were overpowered by the superior numbers and resources of their enemies, directed by the ablest of the Russian generals, Diebitsch, Paskewitch, and Gneisenau. After a series of bloody conflicts, Warsaw capitulated to the Russians, and the Polish corps, no longer able to keep the field against their opponents, withdrew into the adjoining territories of Prussia and Austria.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.—The plenipotentiaries of the five powers of Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, assembled in London, since the preceding December, determined irrevocably on the basis of separation between the two countries. The perplexing point, in this negotiation, had been the disposition of Limburg and the duchy of Luxemburg; the inhabitants, being catholics, were favourable to an union with Belgium, and the Belgians coveted these acquisitions; but the duchy was held by a different title by the house of Nassau, and formed part of the Germanic confederation. At length matters seemed arranged by Holland ceding a portion of the duchy, and Belgium a part of the territory of Limburg. Thus settled, the territorial limits of Holland were determined to be those which formed the republic of the United Provinces in the year 1790. Belgium to consist of the kingdom of the Netherlands, as settled in 1815, including South Brabant, Liege, Namur, Hainault, Western Flanders, Eastern Flanders, Antwerp, and parts of Limburg and Luxemburg. The national debt to be divided in the proportion of about two-thirds to Holland, and one-third to Belgium. Perpetual neutrality of Belgium guaranteed by the five powers, and certain fortresses erected at the expense of the four powers in 1815, as a bulwark against France, to be dismantled. The acceptance of these terms was made compulsory on the belligerents.

HANOVER.—There having been symptoms of disaffection in this kingdom in January, the king of England tendered to the States-General a new constitution. The representation to consist of two chambers. The first chamber to consist of the elder princes of the royal family, certain of the hereditary nobility, and persons chosen for life by the king, without reference to rank, birth, or fortune. The second chamber to consist of deputies from the religious houses, from the class of esquires, from cities and towns, and from the classes of landlords, freemen, and peasants, in various boroughs. The members of both chambers, except the royal princes, to be thirty years of age. Deliberations of the chambers to be open to the public.

HESSÉ CASSEL.—The tumults in this electorate, in 1830, led to the establishment of a new constitution. Restrictions on the press were removed; no one to be persecuted for the expression of mere opinion; the secrecy of letters to be inviolate; no exclusive privileges to be granted to commerce or manufactures; no appointments to any office in the state to be confirmed till the occupant has proved himself competent, and no office to be granted in reversion.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Bonn, M. Niebuhr, 53, eminent Roman historian. Rev. Robert Hall, 68, an eloquent dissenting preacher and writer. Henry, earl Mulgrave, 77, a general in the army, and who had held office in the Pitt. Perceval, and Liverpool ministries. At Sydney, in Australia, rev. L. H. Halloran, D.D., 65, a poet and schoolmaster, who had been convicted of forging a frank. Thomas Payne, 79, eminent bookseller, and much respected in the literary world. John Quick, 83, celebrated comedian. John Abernethy, 66, surgeon; popular lecturer and writer on medical subjects, especially the digestive organs. Mrs. Siddons, 75, celebrated tragedian. At his head-quarters, near Pultusk, of cholera, marshal count Diebitsch, 46, distinguished officer in the service of Russia. At Witepsk, of cholera, the archduke Constantine, 52, late viceroy of Poland, and elder brother of the emperor. William Roscoe, 80, late banker of Liverpool, author of the "Life of Lorenzo de Medicis," &c. Mr. Roscoe was among the distinguished men of his time; the friend of humanity, advocate of law reform, the enemy of jobs; "by all the wise admired,—beloved by all the good." (Lord Brougham's Speeches, i. 471.) At New York, James Munro, 72, late president of the United States. Robert William Elliston, 57, popular comedian. Mr. Elliston excelled in Wildair, Archer, Walter, and Aranza; and carrying the seriousness of Aranza a little further, he was the best Mortimer and the best Macbeth of any comic actor. In comedy, after the death of Lewis, he was without a rival. "He had (says the Annual Biography) three distinguished excellencies: dry humour, gentlemanly mirth, and fervid gallantry." At Dublin, John Toler, earl of Norbury, 85. He took an active part in the prosecution of the rebels of 1798, but after the subsidence of civil commotion was famous for wit and drollery, and, besides his own jokes, had also the credit of many of his contemporaries "Lord Norbury's last joke" being a common introduction to a witticism in the newspapers. His lordship, after a protracted sitting there, only retired from the chief justiceship of the Irish common pleas, in 1827. Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, 74, late first commissioner for investigating the debts of the nabob of the Carnatic. John Calcraft, 65, M.P. for the county of Dorset. Mr. Calcraft was paymaster of the forces under the Wellington ministry, but gave the casting vote in favour of the Reform Bill on its first introduction. He had for some months suffered under depression of spirits and committed suicide. James Northcote, 85, celebrated portrait and historical painter. At Exeter, Colonel John Macdonald, 72, writer on military subjects, and the only son of the celebrated Flora Macdonald, who assisted the Pretender in escaping from the English soldiery in 1746. Archibald Cochrane, earl of Dundonald, 82, an ingenious experimentalist in chemistry and agriculture, who made several useful discoveries, not very profitable to himself, being at one period reduced to absolute penury and obliged to receive pecuniary aid from the Literary Fund. At Coburg, the duchess-dowager of Saxe Coburg, 73, mother of the king of Belgium and the duchess of Kent. At Paris, Pamela, widow of the unfortunate lord Edward Fitzgerald, and daughter of madame de Genlis. Sir A. Hart, 72, late lord chancellor of Ireland. In St. Giles's workhouse, Jack Milford, an eccentric author and irreclaimable drunkard. He had received a classical education; was originally in the navy, and fought under Hood and Nelson. Though formerly a nautical fop, the last few years of his life had been ragged and lathsome. He never thought but of the necessities of the moment, and often slept in the fields, when his finances would not admit of his paying for a two-penny lodging in St. Giles's. His largest work was the history of "Johnny Newcome in the Navy," the publisher of which gave him a shilling a day till he finished it. He edited the "Scourge," "Bon Ton Magazine," and "Quizical Gazette," and was the author of the popular sea-song, "The king is a true British sailor." He was occasionally befriended—if such an art be possible to such a character—by the late lord Redesdale, on whom he is reported to have had a natural claim.

A.D. 1832. PREROGATIVE COPYRIGHTS.—The enquiries of a parliamentary committee during the session of 1831, elicited some curious facts relative to the copyrights vested in the crown. In England, the exclusive right of printing bibles is enjoyed by the king's printer, concurrently with the two universities; in Ireland, the monopoly of the king's printer is shared with Trinity College; in Scotland, the whole was in the hands of the king's printer. The late Scotch patent expired in 1838; the Irish will expire in 1851; the English not till 1860. Exclusive of the sale by the universities, the king's printer for England sold in the ten years, from 1821 to 1830 inclusive,—bibles, 569,164; testaments, 637,890; prayer-books, 182,811; psalms, 189,544. The Bible Society and the Naval and Military Bible Society, are the chief purchasers. In 1829, of 51,500 bibles and 75,691 testaments sold by the English patentees, no less a proportion than 49,541 of the former and 68,025 of the latter were bought by these two societies, both of whom are supported by voluntary subscriptions. Several instances of typographical errors were adduced to the committee, in the current edition of the scriptures.

Jan. 2. Chief Justice Tindal opened the commission for the trial of the Bristol rioters. Of 180 rioters taken into custody, 4 were executed and 22 transported.

13. Lieutenant-Colonel Brereton committed suicide pending an inquiry into his conduct by a court-martial. The charges against him were, that he had not displayed, during the Bristol riots, that firmness and decision required in a British officer. A bad state of health, and absence of experience in actual service, seem to have been the leading causes of the colonel's errors. He was fifty-two years old.

17. Parliament met after the holidays.

28. Died at Cheltenham, in his 80th year, Dr. Bell, the introducer into England of the Madras system of education. Shortly before his death, this meritorious divine had transferred very large sums to different bodies for the improvement and diffusion of education. Among the sums so appropriated, were upwards of 100,000*l.* for the establishment of schools in the town of St. Andrew's, where he was born, and 10,000*l.* to the lately erected British Naval School.

31. A General Cemetery, comprising nearly fifty acres, opened on the Harrow Road. It is the first imitation in England of the burial-ground of Père la Chaise, so long the admiration of foreigners visiting Paris.

Feb. 13. CHOLERA MORBUS.—A notice issued from the council office, Whitehall, announcing that fatal cases of the Asiatic spasmodic cholera had occurred at Rotherhithe, spread indescribable alarm through the metropolis. Hitherto, this dreadful malady had only made its appearance in the country towns and villages, especially in the north of England. In the dense and luxurious population of the capital, the most frightful mortality was anticipated; and all the horrors which Defoe had depicted of the Great Plague rose before the imagination: A bill was hurried through parliament, empowering the Privy Council to make regulations in towns or districts affected or threatened with the pestilence, and that the expenses thereby incurred should be defrayed out of the poor-rates. Parochial and district boards were forthwith organized; temporary hospitals got ready for the reception of the sick; medical persons kept in constant attendance to minister to the afflicted, and the interment of persons dying of the disease was hastened. These demonstrations put the public on the alert, and individuals sought safety by timely precautions. Surgeons and apothecaries, previously unemployed, were overwhelmed with patients, real or imaginary, and the shops of the chymists and druggists were rapidly cleared of their principal contents, especially camphor and other reputed disinfecting agents. Cleanliness and increased attention to the general health may have checked the progress of the malady, or if the precautions adopted were disproportioned to the occasion, it was an excess on the safe side. The physicians were divided in opinion, some contending that no new disease existed, and that it was not contagious. However this may have been, that a virulent cholera existed is unquestionable: its ravages were great in the present and two following months of March and April: it then abated, but again burst forth at the end of summer with more violence than ever. It is probable, that during this second attack, when, from prudential motives, the weekly reports of cases and deaths for London were discontinued, that the disease was most destructive. In the whole year, the deaths from cholera, within the limits of the Bills of Mortality, amounted to 3,200; in the past year of 1831 to only 48. On September 2nd, the amount of cases reported by the Central Board, exclusive of London, was 68,853, and the total of deaths, 24,180. Little was heard of the cholera at the close of November. It next appeared in the Canadas and United States; having thus made the tour of the globe, beginning in Asia, and after devastating Moscow and the northern parts of Europe, visiting the British isles and France, and next crossing the Atlantic may have been lost in the great West country, or absorbed in the monsoon of the Pacific Ocean, or returned to the supposed place of its origin, Hindostan.

23. A French expedition landed at Ancona. Disputes had arisen between the Pope and his liberal subjects, and to render unnecessary any pretext for Austrian intervention, by which papal tyranny would have been augmented, the French, without giving umbrage to that power, took possession of the citadel. His Holiness protested loudly against the "invasion" of the legations, and both Austria and England manifested symptoms of jealousy at the presence of the French in Italy, which they did not finally evacuate till six years after, when the Austrians withdrew from the papal territories.

26. An ukase of the emperor Nicholas decrees that Poland shall henceforth be incorporated with Russia, but have its separate administration, and its own civil and criminal code of laws. Other measures were adopted in the course of the year for discouraging the use of the French and Polish languages; the university of Warsaw was dissolved, with the exception of the faculties of medicine and theology, and 5,000 families of Polish gentlemen transplanted from the province of Podolia to the line of the Caucasus.

28. The king held a levee, at which an address was presented by the earl of Roden from the protestants of Ireland, against the Irish Reform Bill. It was signed by 230,000 persons, and was of such magnitude, that it required two men to bear it to the royal presence.

Mar. 1. The first carriage for the conveyance of passengers on a railway in France commenced running from St. Etienne to the Loire.

3. Incendiary fires in the neighbourhood of Bunstable, and property to the amount of 5,000*l.* destroyed.

21. A general fast-day. Much disorder was occasioned by persons assembling in Finsbury Square, supposing that meat and bread were to be distributed. Their majesties heard prayers in the grand music room of Windsor Castle. The commons attended at St. Margaret's church and the lords walked in procession to Westminster Abbey, which attracted great numbers of spectators, no such procession having taken place for many years!

27. The cholera broke out with alarming virulence in Paris: 1000 deaths occurred in the first week. It was much more fatal in the French than in the British capital. Of 45,675 deaths in Paris in 1832, the enormous number of 19,000 was occasioned by cholera. The mortality was greatest in the most unhealthy quarters, where the streets are narrow and the houses very lofty. As the pestilence appeared in the capital without previous manifestation in the sea-ports or frontier towns, it strengthened the opinion that the disease was not contagious, but atmospheric or epidemic.

Apr. 1. Riot at Paris, occasioned by the chiffonniers refusing to submit to the municipal regulations made for preventing the spread of the cholera. This class of persons gained a miserable pittance by raking among the sweepings, which the Parisians heaped outside their doors to be removed by the scavengers in the night. As a sanitary precaution, the nuisance was sought to be removed by light carts with more than ordinary dispatch, which the chiffonniers considered as an invasion of their rights. A disturbance ensued, to which the Republicans and Carlists, generally on the watch for an emeute, promptly lent their aid. It continued two days, and a printer and several others were wounded in the conflicts with the police and military.

14. REFORM BILL IN THE LORDS.—After an arduous debate, continued through four nights, the second reading of this popular bill was carried at seven o'clock in the morning by a majority of nine, the numbers being, for the bill 184, against it, 175. An accession of fifty votes had been obtained since the rejection of the bill last October. Several bishops had, in the interim, joined the ministers, and a new party, denominated "waverers," had sprung up in the lords, who contributed to carry the second reading, but on whom little dependence could be placed for carrying the bill unimpaired through its ulterior stages. Of the peers actually present only a majority of two voted for the bill, and as proxies are not admitted in committee, the prospect of ministers being able to carry their measure undamaged through this ordeal appeared very precarious. Parliament adjourned on the 18th to May 7, for the Easter holidays.

May 2. A bronze statue of the late Mr. Canning, by Westmacott, placed on its pedestal in Palace-yard. The figure is colossal, and measures twelve feet high; the face considered an admirable likeness, but the loose robe thrown over his shoulders too heavy, and the pedestal too small for the figure it supports.

The Rev. B. Irving excluded from the Scotch Church. He was expelled for heresy concerning the human nature of Jesus Christ, and for allowing the exercise of alleged supernatural gifts in his chapel.

7. Ministers defeated in the lords by a majority of 35, on the motion of lord Lyndhurst that the disfranchising clause should be postponed, and the enfranchising clause first considered: the numbers were 151 to 115. Upon which, earl Grey moved the adjournment of the committee to the 10th.

Great meeting at Birmingham to petition government to pass the Reform Bill unimpaired. The London Political Union met, when 1200 new members enrolled their names. A resolution agreed to, that no taxes should be paid till the reform bill had been passed.

9. RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS.—The inability of ministers to carry such an efficient measure of reform as they deemed advisable was the avowed ground of their resignation. Previous to this, the popular opinion had been that earl Grey had received ample powers, in case of need, for the creation of peers; but it now appeared that the king's assent so to exercise the royal prerogative had neither been given nor asked, and it was only after the defeat of the 7th that ministers tendered to the crown the alternative of their resignation or an increase of the peerage. To the latter expedient the king was reluctant to resort, and the resignation of the reform ministers was accepted. His majesty then sent for lord Lyndhurst to advise as to what means existed for forming an administration that would carry an "extensive measure of reform," without obliging the king to have recourse to his prerogative of creating peers. On this basis, a communication was opened by the learned lord with the duke of Wellington and sir Robert Peel. Without being minister himself, the duke offered his services to support the administration of sir R. Peel, and, though still disapproving of all reform, take as much of the reform bill as his grace could carry through the upper house of parliament. Further than this, the duke could not consistently nor even decently lend his aid, his own recent declaration still sounding in the public ear that "no reform was required, and that while he was minister none should be attempted." The clear understanding, however, imposed by the terms of the royal commission was that if sir Robert Peel accepted the premiership, he must support an extensive reform. To this official condition the baronet's objections were insuperable. "He had," he said, "never ceased to be opposed to the bill, and had argued against its revolutionary character. He would not consent to pass it as it was; and with the majority against him he had no hope of being able to modify it."—(House of Commons, May 18th.) The overture to sir Robert having wholly failed, and the impossibility of forming an administration that was at all likely to endure being self-evident, the duke of Wellington recommended to the king to recall his former servants. The conditions on which the Whigs resumed office on the 18th were honourable to their firmness and integrity. They were, that the bill should be carried into effect "unimpaired in all its principles, and uninjured in all its essential provisions;" and the royal assurance was obtained that so far as it depended upon the king, the "means of conducting the bill to a successful issue should not be wanting."—(Earl Grey, House of Lords, May 17 and 18.) After this declaration, and the receipt of a private message from the king, the anti-bill peers professed to consider their deliberative wisdom controlled by an irresistible power, and rather than have their house "swamped" by new creations withdrew their opposition to the further progress of the bill. Other causes contributed essentially to the successful issue of this great legislative struggle. Pending the ministerial interregnum of nine days, lord Ebrington's motion was carried by a large majority of the commons, expressive of confidence in the ministers and regret at their resignation. Out of doors, the country was in a very alarming state of unanimity. The tide set all in one direction. Against the bill there was neither moral nor physical force. About its ultimate success no one affected to doubt; that was deemed certain because the nation had willed it. The newspapers were almost entirely on the popular side, and kept up a raking fire against the "Oligarchy" and "usurping Borough-mongers." At London, Birmingham, Manchester, and other large towns simultaneous meetings were held to petition the house of commons to stop the supplies. In the metropolis, placards were everywhere exhibited, enjoining the union of all friends to the cause—an enforcement of the public rights at all hazards—and a general resistance to the payment of taxes, rates, and tithes. The political societies were in active communication, and at their meetings and in the leading daily journals projects for organizing and arming the people were openly discussed and recommended. In case of need, the population of the large towns was ready to be precipitated on the metropolis. But this extremity was rendered unnecessary. The firm and generous devotion of William IV. to "an extensive reform," whether carried by Whigs or Tories, deprived the hostile section of the aristocracy of the sole fulcrum, by which, with the least chance of success, it could hope to resist the universal sentiment. The date of the subjoined regal circular, which has been alluded to above, addressed to the peers by the king's private secretary, sir Herbert Taylor, will show the time when the great state screw, in possession of the crown, was applied to the upper chamber:—

"St. James's Palace, May 17, 1832.

"MY DEAR LORD,—I am honoured with his Majesty's commands to acquaint your Lordship, that all difficulties to the arrangements in progress will be obviated by a declaration in the House to-night from a sufficient number of peers, that, in consequence of the present state of affairs, they have come to the resolution of dropping their further opposition to the Reform Bill, so that it may pass without delay, and as nearly as possible in its present shape.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your's sincerely,

"HERBERT TAYLOR."

The triumph of the Reform Bill was now assured: its clauses passed rapidly through the committee of the lords with merely verbal and elucidatory amendments, and on the 4th June, on earl Grey moving that it be read a third time, the question was carried by 106 to 22.

May 15. Died at Paris, of cholera, aged 54, M. CASIMIR PERIER, the able prime minister of France. M. Perier was a banker and extensive proprietor of manufactories, out of which he had realised immense riches. He had taken a resolute and intrepid part in the overthrow of the government of Charles X., and was the firm friend of regulated freedom. As a minister of Louis Philip he deprecated anarchy and foreign war; and in an eloquent address to the chamber of deputies, March 7, vindicated the pacific and conservative policy of his administration. He was succeeded in office and in political principles by marshal Soult, the minister-of-war.

On the same day died of paralysis at Paris, aged 63, BARON CUVIER, the great comparative anatomist.

30. DEATH OF SIR JAMES MACINTOSH. —The health of this amiable man and eloquent writer and statesman, which was never robust, had suffered by his residence in India. His death, however, which took place at his house in Langham Place, London, was hastened by the feverish excitement produced by the small bone of a fowl lodging in his throat. He was born in 1765, at Aldourie on the banks of Loch Ness within seven miles of Inverness. His father was a military captain, and from him he inherited a small estate, which for two centuries had been in the family. He was not fortunate in his early teachers, they were careless and immethodical. At the Edinburgh university he took the degree of M.D., after which he repaired to London to practise as a physician. On this arena he appears to have attained notoriety with less delay and struggling than commonly awaits the insulated adventurer. His first literary attempt; however, was unsuccessful—it was a pamphlet that nobody read, written in support of the unlimited succession to the regency by the prince of Wales, and was the side of the question Mr. Fox and other personal friends of his royal highness had espoused, regardless of the parliamentary constitution of the government as settled by the whigs at the revolution. This failure was redeemed by the extraordinary success of his Vindice Gallicæ in 1791; which, among its other merits, had that of correcting the errors of Mr. Burke relative to the French economists. It raised him at once to a high rank in politics and literature, and made him acquainted with the principal leaders of the opposition. It is, indeed, a masterly performance, written in a style different from that which characterised his subsequent productions, and more in the manner of his gifted opponent; being diffuse, vehement, and metaphorical. About this time he left medicine to devote himself to law, and, in 1795, was qualified to join the home circuit. In the following year he became personally known to Burke, having formed a less flattering estimate of the bearing of the French revolution since writing the Vindice Gallicæ. "Since that time," he says in a letter to the orator, "a melancholy experience has undeceived me on many subjects in which I was then the dupe of my own enthusiasm." There was nothing remarkable in this transition of sentiment in a young man, nor even in an old one, after the political lessons afforded by the intervening five years; but Mackintosh has been accused of turning sharply on his co-disciples in error, and of having formed an exaggerated estimate both of the duration and magnitude of the calamities produced in France, by an excess of confidence in popular intelligence. His first wife was now living. She was the sister of Peter and Daniel Stuart, the respective proprietors of the Oracle and Morning Post, the former a Pittite, and the latter a Foxite paper. Dr. Parr used to relate that Mackintosh wrote leading articles for each of those journals, suited to their respective politics.—(Law Magazine, x.vii. 166.) He also wrote in the Monthly Review; which literary exertions were necessary to the support of himself and family, his practice at the bar being inconsiderable and little productive. An introductory lecture delivered by him on the Law of Nature and of Nations obtained the marked approval of Mr. Pitt; while his late associate in the cause of liberty, Mr. Godwin, withdrew in astonishment from Lincoln's Inn Hall, on hearing his friend wind up an eloquent period against "the idle theorists who built their expectations upon such absurd chimeras as a golden mountain or a perfect man." This reaction seems to have continued, without any public intimation of abatement, until he returned, in 1812, to England, from the recordership of Bombay, which appointment he held for eight years, and had obtained from Lord Sidmouth through the intervention of Mr. Pitt. He now resumed his connexion with the whigs, having declined a political overture made to him by Mr. Perceval: for, says he, "it had long been my fixed determination not to go into public life on any terms inconsistent with the principles of liberty, which are now higher in my mind than they were twenty years ago."—(Memoirs by his Son, ii. 246.) Sir James continued steadfastly to act with this party to the end of the war, and during fifteen years of peace; when, on the formation of Earl Grey's ministry, he received a subordinate place at the India Board! He had refused the same appointment eighteen years before, and it was generally considered immeasurably below his deserts, especially in contrast with others who were included in the cabinet. For this neglect various reasons have been assigned. One of the strongest is that Sir James was unfit to be placed at the head of any department; in matters of business he was negligent and remiss in the extreme; though apologetically eloquent on set occasions, he was not a ready debater; while, as a practical man, in all that related to the details of measures and the conducting of them through the house of commons, he was singularly helpless and incompetent. Moreover he was not a decided partisan of any denomination. The whigs had the largest share of his affections, but he felt no marked dislike towards the Tories. In politics he inclined to universal toleration; balanced and too often indulged the over-refining cautiousness, belonging to the class whom Bacon impugns because they "object too much, consult too long, adventure too little, and seldom drive business home." Right or wrong, this was his settled principle, no less than his practice. In his beautiful "Life of Sir Thomas More," he says, "All men, in the fierce contests of contending factions, should, from such an example, learn the wisdom to fear, lest in their most hated antagonist they may strike down a Sir Thomas More; for assuredly virtue is not so narrowed as to be confined to any party; and we have, in the case of More, a signal example that the nearest approach to perfect excellence does not exempt men from mistakes which we may justly deem mischievous. It is a pregnant proof that we should beware of hating men for their opinions, or of adopting their doctrines because we love and venerate their virtues." A philosophical creed, not usually admitted in party warfare, which requires that animosities should be kept up at the full theological heat, and no virtue in action or motive be conceded to an opponent. A like velvet softness pervaded the moral and metaphysical philosophy of sir James. He inclined to an equitable adjustment of opinions. His mind was amply stored with the collective wisdom of ages; and he loved to hold the scales, and by a constant shifting and sorting of quantities prevent the preponderance of either. In his religious opinions he indulged in a similar seesaw; and, from the description of his latter moments, it is difficult to discern whether he expired an unbeliever or a Christian. His proneness to stand on the lisière elicited from Madame de Staël the name of Mr. Harmony; and though his varied knowledge and great colloquial powers were much admired by that erudite lady, she always complained that Mackintosh wanted genius. He was, in truth, not an original producer of intellect any more than a retailer of it to the common people; but he was a great capitalist, who dealt largely with the aristocratic orders. His eloquence was of the exhibitiv kind; neither concentrated nor argumentative. It was the eloquence of the chair or the bench, rather than of the bar or the tribune. His written style is neat, elegant, and correct; but partakes of his constitutional languor, and is deficient in movement and force. His most celebrated forensic effort was his oration, in 1803, for Peltier, prosecuted for a libel on Napoleon. The accumulated stores of a richly cultivated mind were lavishly poured forth in depicting the progress of the French revolution and its giant child. It failed, however, in obtaining the acquittal of his client, and was considered injudicious as a defence, though a brilliant display of historical knowledge and philosophical acumen. His early speeches on parliament are said to have disappointed expectation; but on the occasion of the escape of Buonaparte from Elba he delivered one of the finest harangues ever heard in the house of commons. He was also distinguished by his speeches in the affair of Naples; the congress of Laybach; the oppression suffered by the Greeks; the introduction of the jury-law into Scotland; the government of Australia, and the amendment of the criminal code. To be a star in the senate, in the forum, in literature, and society, attests varied and extraordinary abilities. Notwithstanding, sir James does not appear to have belonged to the highest order of merit, either in decision of character, firmness of principle, or originality of mind. He was a lover of letters and philosophy; more prone to investigate than decide; of no confirmed opinions, though eminently acute, learned, and disquisitive; not remarkable for active benevolence, but affable, kind, even-tempered, affectionate, and disinterested: in short, he would have made a very good French abbé before the revolution, and he described himself with tolerable correctness in a letter to his friend, Robert Hall, when he said, "My nature would have been better consulted if I had been placed in a quieter station, where speculation might have been my business, and visions of the fair and good my chief recreation."

June 3. FUNERAL OF GENERAL LAMARQUE.—The inveterate hostility of the Carlists and Republicans continued to endanger the government of Louis Philip. La Vendée and three other departments, containing a population of 2,000,000, were on the point of insurrection, and by a royal ordinance of the 4th were placed under martial law. The capital had been a scene of almost uninterrupted tumults since the beginning of the year, and plots were constantly being formed, suspected persons arrested, and ministers, by prosecutions sought to curb the violence of the opposition journals. At this juncture, the public funeral of general Lamarque offered a favourable opportunity for bringing into a focus all the elements of political discontent; and, as the throne of the king had been established by one daring outbreak of popular resistance, it might be overturned by another. The general himself had been one of the movement party,—a popular deputy and distinguished soldier of the republic and the empire. He was generally beloved; and an immense procession was formed to do honour to his remains, consisting of deputies and peers, national guards, the artillery of the city, and the exiled patriots of Poland, Germany, Spain, and Belgium. Spirited orations were delivered from a platform by M. Mauguin, Lafayette, marshal Clausel, and the Portuguese general Saldanha. The refusal of the duke of Fitzjames to pay respect to the deceased, or a quarrel between the Amis du Peuple and a regiment of dragoons, was the beginning of the disturbance. Cries were raised of "Aux armes," "A bas Louis Philippe," "Vive la république." Barricades were formed, the lamps broken, and attempts made to unpave the streets. The rioters, aided by some of the pupils of the Polytechnique school, displayed all the spirit of the days of July; but the population not being so unanimous, and the king and his minister-of-war acting with firmness, order was ultimately restored. This, however, was not accomplished without an immense sacrifice of life: in the terrible conflicts in the streets between the populace and the military 1,000 persons were killed or wounded. In the course of the night of the 5th, seals were placed on the presses of the Tribune, Quotidienne, and the Courier de l'Europe, by order of the police. Next day, the king issued three ordinances declaring Paris in a state of siege, dissolving the company of the artillery of the national guard, and disbanding the pupils of the Polytechnique School. This was almost as great a stretch of power as Charles X. had been dethroned for attempting, and, if constitutional, demonstrated that the liberties of the French were still held by uncertain guarantees. But the arbitrariness of the king was corrected by the tribunals. On the 30th, the Court of Cassation decided that the ordinance declaring Paris in a state of siege was illegal; and annulled the sentences pronounced by courts-martial on the prisoners convicted of rioting and rebellion.

6. DEATH OF JEREMY BENTHAM.—This celebrated jurist and law reformer expired in Westminster, in the 85th year of his age, of an attack of bronchitis. He survived to hear of the success of the Reform Bill, an event he hailed with satisfaction, and during the last quarter of a century had witnessed the gradual spread in the New and Old World of those principles of legislation, that had formed the staple occupation of his life to inculcate. His earliest literary labours are dated so far back that they have not inaptly been considered antediluvian;—he was a young man with the Scotts, and at Lansdowne-house mingled in the society of Dunning, Pratt, Wedderburn, and other lawyers and orators of the first American war. But more disinterested than some of his contemporaries, he did not seek to profit by, but to reform public abuses; and his father's death leaving him in possession of competence, he was enabled to choose his own atmosphere, and, at once, abandoned a promising career he had commenced at the Chancery bar, to devote himself singly and in seclusion to pursuits he esteemed likely to be more useful to mankind and consonant to his own notions of moral rectitude. This was about fifty-six years since, when he published a Fragment on Government, in answer to what Mr. Blackstone had said on the subject in his Commentaries. He was the first to rebel against prescription—against the authority of the sages of the Year Books and Reports. No one before him thought of seriously impugning the principles of English jurisprudence. The business of the legal student was to master its jargon, its technical and artificial rules, and bow implicitly to its dicta. Mr. Bentham dissented from this passive homage, and boldly questioned the fitness of a system established in a rude for a refined age. He was well qualified to enter on this unbeaten field. A lawyer himself, he was eligible to sit in judgment on the forms, mysteries, and usages of his profession. Moreover, he was a learned man, well versed in ancient languages, philosophy, and history; he was a travelled man, had visited and observed most European countries; he was a man of the world, too, though mostly living out of it—saw and communed with its chief luminaries—and no one kept a more watchful look-out, from the panopticon of his retreat, on every occurrence, political, forensic, or social, than the philosopher of Queen-square Place. He also naturally possessed rare intellectual endowments; was eminently acute, shrewd, and investigative; fearless and uncompromising in his researches after truth; and at an early period, few could more clearly and forcibly illustrate their ideas, or convey them in language more simple, terse, and eloquent. It is not, therefore, wonderful that an individual so highly gifted should have made an impression on his age, and succeeded in planting his own authority in place of the antiquity he perseveringly assailed. This is so far the case, that Bentham's name is frequently heard in legislative assemblies; it has even been respectfully adduced in the court of Chancery, and few now think of defending institutions because they exist, apart from their adaptation to living interests. The old idols have been so far destroyed that danger has arisen, lest, in the enthusiasm of victory, a new idolatry should be established on their ruins, not less autocratical and without appeal. There can, however, be no finality in intellect, however great, any more than in social institutions, however perfect. The world is still too young, has afforded too few lessons of political experience, for any one to affirm by what principles mankind can be best governed, and we must be content some time longer to go on experimenting and collecting new facts before legislation can be reduced to a science. It was a premature attempt to apply maxims for which the nations were unfit, that has mainly delayed the constitutional settlement of the Peninsula, and kept alive the sanguinary divisions of the South American republics. A kindred error appears to appertain to the Benthamite theories. They aspire to be universal without regard to time, place, or circumstance. They take in only one element of Man, his reason, leaving out his passions, which constitute the chief motive part of his existence, whether as an individual or member of society. They provide for the rational, for which there hardly needs provision, leaving out the irrational, that constitute the vast majority, and for whose guidance restraint, law, and government are alone requisite. It is only by collating the abstractions of philosophy with history that practical government can be perfected. The utility of this is evinced by observing the working of the universal suffrage principle, which Mr. Bentham, in his later years, advocated as the necessary guarantee of good government. But in England we appear to have had already too much of universal suffrage government, and it is to this species of dictatorship over the sway of the intelligent that may be ascribed the chief public calamities. It was the subserviency of universal suffrage to the purposes of misrule, not by votes but by popular clamour, that precipitated the country into the first war with the American colonies; that delayed the emancipation of the Roman catholics; and that hurried on hostilities with France in 1793. Had the general voice—the shout of a numerical majority—prevailed, we should not have had a Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century. It was its transitory predominance that paved the way for the anarchical butcheries of Robespierre, and the military usurpations of Cromwell and Buonaparte. Metaphysical ideas are useful for general guidance; they are the goal to aim at, but cannot be unexceptionably applied in actual life. They are to the legislator what the stars are to the mariner; they direct his path in the open sea, but history is the terrestrial chart that shows where the rocks and quicksands lie in the onward course of his navigation. The government of an age will always be a problem for the age, which cannot be solved by an established formula, however ingeniously constructed. It is an equation into which few constant quantities enter; not only their number but value varies from the fluctuations of social interests, the prevalence of ignorance or knowledge, virtue or vice, patriotism or faction, piety or superstition, riches or poverty. At different times and in different places, under these shifting impulses, nations are constantly being carried away, and a Solon or Lycurgus, in framing institutions for a people, can no more overlook them than an engineer can overlook the resistance of the air in directing the flight of a shell or cannon-ball. The mind of Mr. Bentham was more mechanical than philosophical; more quick than profound; more subtle than comprehensive; more fertile in devising expedients for obviating specific evils, than in framing organic changes in harmony with the general action of human passions, habits, and opinions. Thus the ballot was his specific for sinister influence in elections; "single-seated justice," or the judgment of one for judicial irresponsibility. He had the same faith in maxims that our ancestors had in proverbs. Though sagacious and well-informed, his judgment on the adaptation of means to ends was eccentric and unequal. What misapplied labours were his Parliamentary Reform Catechism and his Church of Englandism! How contradictory to leave his body for the interests of science and not his fortune; to bequeath the redaction of his posthumous works to a poet in lieu of a philosopher, and to project rules for giving precision to the language of legislators, while his own was all but incomprehensible! A habit of self-communion had the effect commonly observed in secluded men, of producing an over-weening love of his own conceptions. Bewildered or weary through interminable musings in the pursuit of truth, heat length, it is said, came to relish a joke or an anecdote better than a reason. (Speeches of Lord Brougham, ii. 296.) The temperament of Mr. Bentham was peculiar; it was arid, and without soul, like his philosophy. Eloquence had no charm for him: what is more remarkable, the wonderful discoveries of physical science excited in him no admiration; nor did he value them beyond their power to minister to the common uses of life; for works of imagination he had no taste, and used to rejoice that the world would never again see an epic poem. His oldest friends died unregretted and without sympathy; and of one we are told (Ibid. 298) he always spoke disrespectfully, because he disappointed some extravagant hopes which he had formed that the bulk of a large fortune, acquired by industry, would be expended in furthering political improvements. These, however, are only spots in the disk of the most shining and useful light of modern times, and much may be said per contra. There was no guile or hypocrisy in Bentham's nature. If he did not like a man or an opinion he did not conceal or disguise his aversion. His morals were unblemished; his honesty incorruptible; his word inviolate. There was nothing low or sordid in his aspirations. To serve mankind he threw away ambition, power, and riches. His writings are a well of important truths at which Romilly, Mackintosh, and Brougham filled their vessels, and gratefully acknowledged their obligations, especially the last, with a noble oblivion of his own transcendent claims. Posterity will appreciate and do justice to Jeremy Bentham, and they cannot build too high a monument for him who first rivetted attention on the great truth, that the sole end of morals, laws,

July 7. ROYAL ASSENT TO THE REFORM BILL.—This was given to the English bill on the 7th by commission, and an end put to the political suspense and excitement which had existed in an intense degree ever since the dissolution of the Wellington ministry at the close of 1830. The public joy was evinced by congratulatory addresses, partial illuminations, the projection of almshouses for the deserving indigent, dinners to the poor, exhibition of flags, the ringing of church bells, and other peaceful demonstrations. The disfranchisement of the decayed boroughs, and the enfranchisement in their stead of great and populous towns, effected a momentous change by substituting real in place of the nominal representation that previously existed. An entire new constituency of ten pound householders was created in cities and boroughs, which, though a fixed amount, was a variable standard, in different parts of the kingdom, so as to include in the burgess order a portion of every class of householders or occupants. The county representation was cast entirely anv. Six representatives were given to Yorkshire, two for each riding; Lincolnshire, Devon, Kent, Lancashire, and twenty-two other large counties were divided; and two knights given to each division; Berkshire and six other counties were to return three instead of two members each; Carmarthen, Denbigh, and Glamorgan two instead of one member. The county constituency was greatly extended. Heretofore, it had been restricted to forty-shilling freeholders. It was extended to copyholders of 10*l.* per annum; to lessees of 10*l.*, if for not less than sixty years, or of 50*l.*, if not less than twenty years; and tenants-at-will, if occupying at a yearly rent of not less than 50*l.* The last clause was carried against ministers; it was objected to as bringing in a class of electors too dependent on their landlords; but was supported by Mr. Hume and other strenuous reformers, who declared that the sole principle for which they had contended, and the basis of the Reform Bill itself was the enfranchisement, not disqualification of any class. The reform bills for Scotland and Ireland, and the bills for dividing the counties and for fixing the boundaries of cities and boroughs, followed close on the heels of the English Reform Act, and were completed before the close of the legislative session. The reform bill for Scotland received the royal assent July 17; that of Ireland August 7. An addition of eight members was made to the representation of Scotland, and five to Ireland, making, with the five added to Wales, a deduction of eighteen from the representation of England. There was no popular representation in Scotland prior to the reform act. The burgess representatives were returned by the decayed corporations of the royal burghs. The county representatives by freeholders, whose title consisted in holding of the crown a mere right of superiority over lands, being themselves crown vassals, while the real proprietors of the land were vassals under them, paying feu-duties trifling in themselves, and of no value unconnected with the political privilege. It followed that the elective franchise was wholly dis severed from property. A man might have an estate of 2,000*l.* and no right to the superiority. If so, he had no vote. On the other hand, of all the voters in a county not one might possess a foot of land there. By the new act existing franchises are preserved; all persons lawfully on the roll of freeholders in any shire, continue eligible to vote; but the franchise is extended to the owner of any land, house, feu-duties or other heritable subject of the yearly value of 10*l.* In cities and towns the right of voting has been taken from the town councils and delegates, and extended to every person occupying a tenement of 10*l.* a year. The Irish Reform Act proceeded on the same liberal principle of enfranchisement, but preserving existing rights. To Limerick, Waterford, Belfast, Galway, and the university of Dublin, one additional member to each was given. Right of voting in boroughs extended to 10*l.* tenants; in counties to copyholders and leaseholders, same as England, with the exception of the alteration of fourteen for twenty years, and 20*l.* for 50*l.* in respect of lessees. An effort was made by Mr. O'Connell to obtain the restoration of the franchise to the forty-shilling freeholders, but this was successfully resisted on the ground that the 'forties' in Ireland were not a description of freeholders qualified, by independence or intelligence, to exercise the franchise, either with benefit to themselves or others. The following exhibits the relative state of the representation in counties and boroughs, before and after the reform acts:—

English County Members . . .	82	143
Cities and Boroughs . . .	403	324
Universities . . .	4	4
Welsh County Members . . .	12	15
Cities and Boroughs . . .	12	14
Scottish County Members . . .	30	30
Cities and Boroughs . . .	15	23
Irish County Members . . .	64	64
Cities and Boroughs . . .	35	39
University . . .	1	2

The loss of England on the popular side has been a transfer of 18 of her representatives to the other divisions of the empire, and the increase, relative to the cities and boroughs, in the number of county members. Her chief gain has been an increase in the number, and improvement in the intelligence and independence of the constituency. Scotland has benefitted the most, and Ireland, probably, in the smallest degree by the reform acts.

18. The Duke of Wellington returning from the Tower assailed by the populace in Fenchurch-street, and nearly dismounted.

19. A stone thrown at his Majesty while on the grand stand at Ascot races, which hit him on the forehead. The offender was a discharged Greenwich pensioner, with only one leg, who acknowledged he committed the outrage in revenge that no notice had been taken of a petition which he had sent. He was tried and convicted of intending some bodily harm to the king, and sentenced to be beheaded, but respited.

26. Hon. G. Spencer, brother of viscount Althorp, ordained a roman catholic priest at the hands of Cardinal Zaria in the church of St. Gregory at Rome.

28. Diet at Frankfurt issued their manifesto of measures adopted to preserve order and tranquillity in Germany. It excited great agitation, being mainly directed against the freedom of the press, and alleged seditious assemblages, and bound each member of the German Confederacy to mutual assistance in case of political disturbances. About a fortnight after it was followed by a second decree, interdicting the circulation of the journals. The mandates of the diet were enforced in Hanover, by the duke of Cambridge, the representative of the king of England.

30. Chantrey's statue of the late James Watt placed on its pedestal, in George-square, Greenock. The face is fine and said to be a good likeness. Mr. Watt sat to Chantrey some time before his death, and it is from the bust then made that the statue in white marble, in Westminster Abbey, and another of the same material in the British Museum, have been modelled.

July 2. St. Jean d'Acre surrendered to Ibrahim, son of Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt. Ibrahim soon after defeated, in a great battle near Damascus, the army of the Sultan, and threatened to penetrate into Asia Minor. The Turks were eager to avail themselves of European tactics and discipline, but the Egyptians had anticipated them.

3. Lord Durham and suite sailed on an embassy extraordinary to Russia.

8. Don Pedro, ex-emperor of Brazil, arrived at Oporto, having sailed from Michael's, in the Azores, on the 23rd inst. His fleet consisted of 80 vessels, and his army of 7,500 men, of whom the best and bravest portion were 1000 English and French adventurers. The object of Don Pedro's enterprise was the establishment of his daughter Donna Maria on the throne of Portugal, usurped by her uncle Don Miguel. Oporto was promptly abandoned to the invader, and obstinate conflicts ensued in the neighbourhood between the two brothers, but the year closed without either side obtaining a decided advantage.

8. Mr. Jeremie, a zealous advocate of negro emancipation, having been nominated by government to act as attorney-general in the colony of Mauritius, arrived there agreeably to his appointment. No sooner had he landed, than a great part of the white population assembled to resist his admission to office; and a deputation represented to the governor, sir Charles Colville, the impossibility of maintaining the public peace, if Mr. Jeremie was not dismissed. Sir Charles was induced to comply with their demands, and Mr. Jeremie returned to England in the same vessel that carried him out.

12. The cholera commits great ravages in the Canadas, especially Montreal and Quebec.

20. Mr. Osbaldiston, for a wager, trotted the celebrated American horse Rattler thirty-four miles in two hours, eighteen minutes, and fifty-six seconds; the horse was injured by the exertion and died next day.

23. Parliament granted 15,000*l.* to erect a national picture gallery and record office.

27. The conduct of Major Wyndham in causing a soldier, named Alexander Somerville, to be flogged under the plea of disobedience of orders, though, it was alleged, in reality, for having expressed certain political opinions, having been subjected to a military court of inquiry, the major was acquitted of any such conduct, but censured for informality in having reproved him for those opinions after his punishment, in presence of the regiment. Somerville shortly after obtained his discharge, and a subscription of 300*l.* was raised for him.

Aug. 7. Duchess of Kent and the princess Victoria visit the lake and pass of Llanberis. The royal party embarked at the northern extremity of the lake, a few hundred yards from the ruins of the Hall of Llewellyn, where Edward I. embarked to attack the Welsh when they made their last stand. Here her royal highness entered the boat of T. R. Smith, Esq., at the stern of which floated the royal standard of Russia, for the first time since the days of Peter.

12. Marriage of Leopold, king of Belgium, with a daughter of the king of the French, celebrated at Compiègne.

13. John Williams, aged 32, a waterman of Waterloo Bridge, performed the laborious task of rowing 99 miles within 12 hours. No man ever before achieved the undertaking. Two skilful rowers once performed the distance in thirteen hours.

29. A public discussion took place at Birmingham, between Mr. Thomas Attwood, the banker, and Mr. William Cobbett, on the best mode of relieving the distress of the country. Mr. Attwood's plan was, the issuing of an unlimited number of one-pound notes: Mr. Cobbett's, what he termed an equitable adjustment of the taxes, public and private debts, &c. The audience decided in favour of Mr. Attwood.

GREEK TREATY.—The long-pending negotiations between Russia, England, and France, having for their object the erection of Greece into an independent monarchy, concluded with a treaty, of which the following is the substance:—1. Prince Otho, of Bavaria, to bear the title of king of Greece, with right of succession in order of primogeniture. 2. Three Bavarian councillors to govern during the minority of the prince, appointed by the king of Bavaria; Otho to be of age in June, 1833. 3. The three powers guarantee a loan to Otho, not exceeding 60,000,000 of francs, to be raised by three equal instalments. 4. Indemnity out of the loan to be paid to the Porte for any territorial cessions to complete the Grecian frontier. 5. Bavaria to furnish 3,500 troops for the service of Greece, to be equipped and maintained by the Greek state. 6. Bavarian officers to organise a national army in Greece. About the same period, a protocol was signed at Constantinople, by which the Porte assented to the extension of the Greek frontier as required by the London Conference, from the Gulf of Arta to that of Volo, and recognised the independence of the Greek state. An indemnity of 40 millions of piastres to be paid to the Porte out of the proceeds of the loan guaranteed by the powers. It was not till December 6 that Otho left Munich for Nauplia, to take possession of the new sovereignty, that had long gone a begging among European princes.

Sept. 15. Duke Charles of Brunswick, who had been deposed in 1813, in consequence of his unpopular measures and personal incapacity for governing, banished from Paris, where he had been plotting to raise an expedition to unseat his brother Duke William, whom the Brunswickers had raised to the sovereignty in his stead.

18. Charles X. of France left Holyrood House for the Continent.

21. DEATH OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—

This highly popular author expired of paralysis, of which decided symptoms had appeared in the preceding winter, and was the same disease of which his father had died a few years older. A rapid tour in Italy had not retarded the progress of the fatal malady, and sir Walter, on his return passed through London in July, in a state of hopeless debility, on his way to his much-loved abode of Abbotsford. Though his death had been expected for some months its announcement drew forth a general expression of regret and commiseration, heightened by its lingering approach, and the painful circumstances of pecuniary difficulty by which it had been preceded and hastened. He was buried at Dryburgh Abbey on the 26th, among the ruins of which his family possess a small piece of sepulchral ground, given them by the earl of Buchan. The public testified their respect to his memory by opening a munificent subscription for the erection of a suitable testimonial, and which ultimately amounted to 17,200*l.*, the whole, or a portion of which, it is intended to apply to the redemption of Abbotsford for the use of his descendants. The illustrious deceased was born at Edinburgh, August 15, 1771. His father, Mr. Walter Scott, was a respectable writer to the signet, a branch of the law profession in Scotland corresponding to that of attorney or solicitor in England. Sir Walter was the third child of a family of six sons and one daughter, all of whom he survived. His boyhood was sickly, and he mostly resided with his grandfather at Sandy Know, a farmhouse, occupying an elevated site near the old border fortlet called Smailholm Tower, overlooking the vale of the Tweed and other romantic scenery famous in Scottish story. It was here, surrounded by reminiscences of Flodden Field, the Northumbrian marches, moss-trooper forays, the ruins of Melrose, Dryburgh, and the storied streams of Teviot, Ettrick, Yarrow, and Gala-water, aided by nursery ballads and traditionary legends, that Scott imbibed that enthusiastic passion for minstrelsy, clanship, and Rob Roy life, which formed the dominant feature of his mind. At the age of sixteen, his health experienced a sudden and decisive improvement. It became robust, and he grew up into a strong muscular man, upwards of six feet high. He never, however, recovered the use of his right limb, which was shrunk, and required to be supported by a staff that he carried close to his toes, the heel turning a little inwards. Had it not been for his lameness, it is likely he would have been a soldier, instead of a poet and novelist, and for which he was naturally suited by his border gifts and martial sympathies. He was not a forward scholar; nor as an advocate at the Scottish bar did he acquire or anxiously seek eminence; nor was he conspicuous at the debating societies, where the candidates for forensic honours usually train themselves, and where moral and metaphysical subtleties generally form the staple topics of discussion. He was, however, a frequenter of the theatres, an inveterate story-teller, studious, and a great reader, especially of books of fiction, biography, general and local history, voyages, and travels. It was a peculiarity in sir Walter, who was mirthful and convivial, that he had no ear for music; and though he was wont on festive occasions, when pressed, to contribute his vocal quota, he was incapable of producing two notes consecutively in time or tune. In 1797 he married Miss Carpenter, the daughter of a French royalist, of considerable personal attractions, with whom he had become acquainted at the watering place of Gillsland in Cumberland, and who possessed an annuity of 400*l.* per annum. In the preceding year, he had published a translation of two ballads, 'William and Helen' and the 'Wild Huntsman,' written by the German poet Burger, which had attracted much attention, and of which several versions by different persons had already been printed. This was his first acknowledged literary effort, and its success was not flattering. Without allowing himself to be discouraged by this adventure, he continued the culture of German literature, and, in 1799, published a translation of Goethe's tragedy of 'Goetz of Berlichingen.' A year or two previously, he had been appointed quartermaster to the Edinburgh light horse, for whom he composed a spirited war-song. After his marriage, he spent several summers in a delightful cottage at Lasswade, on the banks of the Esk, whence he was accustomed to make 'raids' into Liddesdale for the purpose of collecting the ballad poetry of that romantic and primitive district. This collection, joined to various contributions from reciters in other parts of the country, formed the basis of 'The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' which established his reputation as a poetical antiquary, and writer of considerable power and promise in prose and verse. In 1803 he left the bar, entirely to devote himself to the more congenial pursuit of letters. "There had been no great love between them at the beginning, and it had not increased by further acquaintance." He was in circumstances to follow his inclination without imprudence. By his appointment of sheriff, which he had obtained, and his wife's annuity, he had a certain income of 700*l.* independent of the property left him by his father. He further guaranteed his pecuniary independence by obtaining three years after the reversion of the lucrative office of principal clerk in the court of session. The publication of the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' in 1805, was the beginning of his poetical renown. It was his first original work, produced him 769*l.* and a world of fame. 'Marmion,' his second poem of magnitude, and, in the opinion of the author and some others, his best metrical production, followed, and promptly obtained from the publisher 1,000*l.* It provoked, however, a sharp dissection from Mr. Jeffrey (Edinburgh Review, April, 1808), who could not implicitly acquiesce in the new taste awakened by the genius of the bard, and rabidly patronised by the caprice of fashion. The prince of critics, who exercised a fearful sway over the irritable tribe, contended that the building of an abbey or a castle would be as germane to the age as the revival of the obsolete rhyming and grotesque usages of our forefathers. His strictures were doubtless felt, though the minstrel was too wary a foe-man openly to avow displeasure at his friend's criticism, further than by some retaliatory proceedings, one of which was the starting of the Quarterly Review on the alleged ground of the noxious politics of the northern periodical, which Scott represented to Ellis, Gifford, and other Tories, as corrupting the public mind by its large sale of 9,000 copies and the dexterous talent with which it was conducted. Having been a colleague in the Edinburgh Review, Scott was enabled to give some shrewd advice, which he did, to Mr. Gifford, about the most skilful mode of conducting the rival journal. His own literary occupations were various and voluminous; besides poems and reviews, and articles in a New Annual Register—another, but abortive bomb, directed against the Whigs—he edited new editions of Dryden and Swift, Sadler's State Papers, and Somers's Tracts. That a writer of original powers should occupy himself in such tedious and inglorious tasks puzzled his literary contemporaries, but the mystery has been since unravelled. It appears that about the time when sir Walter withdrew from professional life, he, with the view of increasing an income already considerable, entered into a secret partnership with an old schoolfellow and friend, James Ballantyne, in the printing business, to which was afterwards added the bookselling business carried on by John Ballantyne. To this firm he advanced money and stipulated for one-third share of the profits of the printing business, which he expected greatly to increase by his influence among booksellers and law-agents. All the works he afterwards wrote, edited, or compiled; he stipulated with the purchasers of the copyrights that they should be printed at the Ballantynes press. It is a rule both in Scotland and England, that no barrister shall be a trader, and doubtless considerations of professional etiquette entered into the motives that induced sir Walter carefully to conceal his mercantile connexion. This secrecy was fraught with evil, and appears to have been mainly instrumental, by the over-speculation it induced, in involving all parties in the pecuniary embarrassments that marked the sequel. For obvious reasons an author is not the safest judge of commercial results; and had sir Walter's publishers been aware that he acted, not only under the ordinary influence of a desire to appear before the public, and the seductions of a congenial occupation, but that he had also a direct interest in keeping the presses of his partners employed, they would have considered more deliberately than they often did the various literary schemes into which his lively imagination and sanguine temperament tempted them to embark. As it was, they judged in the dark, concluded upon testimony that ought to have been suspiciously received, unconscious that the Ballantynes were a kind of batue to sir Walter, who shared largely in all the venison he could drive into it. It forms quite a novelty in literary biography. Publishers are supposed to have the advantage of authors, but sir Walter by his system of double depletion, first, in his contract for literary aid and superintendence with Constable and Co., and then, by his share in the sub-drain at the printing-office, was a match for them. Nearly contemporary with these mercantile connexions, and probably in part the result of them, was the manifestation of another passion, namely, that of becoming a great landowner. The eagerness of the poet for territorial domains and a baronial residence, that might vie with the heritage of the hereditary lords of the soil seems to have kept alive, if it did not originate, his speculative avidity. The building, planting, embellishing, and laying out of Abbotsford in Gothic style; and the storing it with matchlocks, halberds, battle-axes, and other remains of ancient armour, not only absorbed the present gains of the author—great as they were—but drove him on all the common mercantile expedients by which future resources are anticipated. It was, however, at a later period of life that this gulf of ruin opened under him. For many years he enjoyed an unequalled popularity, and which no other writer, probably, during his lifetime, ever enjoyed to the same delirious extent. He was not only the wonder of his own, but of every civilized, community. The 'great Unknown,' the 'mighty magician,' the 'wizard of the North,' are a few of the bombastic titles conferred upon him, and which his extraordinary merit and success elicited from contemporary reviewers. The publication of the 'Lady of the Lake' in 1810, carried to its meridian height his poetical celebrity. It was followed by others which met with a decidedly unfavourable reception, partly from the public having become satiated with his peculiar style, which had lost the charm of novelty; partly, also, from some inferiority, in interest or execution of the poems; but principally to the circumstance of a rival having entered the lists of such prowess as to eclipse even the minstrel knight of Flodden Field and Bannockburn. This was lord Byron, who published the first two cantos of Childe Harold in 1812, and followed up these by a rapid succession of brilliant productions, which for a time cast every thing else in the shape of verse into the shade. Leaving the field of poetry, Scott entered a new arena, in which he won fresh laurels, and a more dazzling renown than in metrical romance. 'Waverley' made its appearance in 1814. It was published without the name of the author, and in consequence, at first, was little noticed, but in a few months it started into a surprising popularity. 'Guy Mannering,' and the 'Antiquary' followed in the next two years, the fame of the author and the appetite of the public increasing with every fresh venture. The Scotch novels proved a richer vein than poetry, and sir Walter having discovered the secret where his strength lay, exerted it with his accustomed judgment and industry. Year after year he poured forth the rich creations of his fertile brain till the prose fictions he had 'twined off' (to use his own phrase) amounted to seventy-four volumes, sold at half-a-guinea per volume. Great as were the merits of these productions, they were not left to depend for success on desert alone; but all the adventitious arts of trade and authorship were dexterously combined into action, to aid and maintain their popularity. The annual profits of his novels, Mr. Lockhart says, (Memoirs, iv. 145) for several years amounted to 10,000*l.*; that is, in Messrs. Constable and Co.'s paper money. The composition of them did not occupy the whole of his time; in addition to reviews, he furnished the articles 'Chivalry,' 'Romance,' and the 'Drama,' to the sixth edition of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia; he was also the author of several fresh poems, histories, letters, and communications to newspapers, besides either editing or assisting in the compilation of numerous works of antiquities, topography, and provincial history. Amidst his various labours he found leisure, not only for his official avocations, but for social enjoyment and rural recreation. When George IV. visited Scotland, he acted as master of the ceremonies; he had been previously honoured with several interviews by that prince, who made him a baronet, and a still higher titular distinction, even that of 'baron,' was aspired to by the poet. At this period, and for some years after, sir Walter considered himself and was considered by the world as a person in very prosperous and enviable circumstances. By an extraordinary union of genius and industry, regulated by a practised judgment, which enabled him to adapt his works to the popular taste, he seemed to have 'fixed a spoke in the wheel of Fortune.' His aristocratic ambition, too, to keep himself as he expresses it 'abreast of society,' had been eminently successful. During the greater part of the summer and autumn he kept house at Abbotsford, like a wealthy country gentleman, receiving with a cordial, yet courtly, hospitality the many distinguished visitors, both from England and the Continent, who found means to obtain an introduction to his 'enchanted castle.' All this apparent security, happiness, and ostentation, however, was destined speedily to crumble into dust. The disasters of sir Walter, like those of Napoleon, were more sudden and overwhelming than his successes. In January, 1826, the great book-selling house of Constable and Co. became bankrupt, involving in its failure, to an extent utterly ruinous, the author of Waverley. By a system of mutual accommodation, by bills and guarantees, which had been long carried on between sir Walter and the insolvent firm, who were his chief publishers, the former had become responsible for debts to the amount of £20,000. The causes of this pecuniary entanglement, so far as sir Walter was concerned, have been already alluded to. The realization of his romantic associations in the Abbotsford mansion, had absorbed from fifty to one hundred thousand pounds. It was only his works of imagination that had been remarkably profitable; and these lighter barks, or to use a more novel and expressive metaphor, these little steam-tugs, powerful as they were, proved unequal to the task of towing along the heavier literary merchandise, with which their talented author had freighted them. The calamity which, to the surprise and grief of the public, thus fell upon sir Walter, he met with a manliness, fortitude, and integrity of principle unparalleled. On meeting the creditors he refused to accept any compromise, and he declared his determination, if life was spared to him, to pay off the last shilling; the only indulgence he asked was time. The divulgement of the Waverley secret became, by the exposure of Constable's concerns, unavoidable; it had, in fact, ceased to be, if it ever were a secret, and was only part of the mystification employed in the Scotch novel manufactory. A series of literary enterprises was vigorously entered upon, the most profitable of which were the "Life of Napoleon" and a new and complete edition of the Waverley novels. The last were illustrated by notes explanatory of the circumstances under which they had been composed; and was equivalent to selling the patent, after the author had long traded with the secret of his inventions. Before the close of 1829, eight volumes had been published and the monthly sale had reached as high as 35,000 copies.—(Lockhart's Memoirs, vii. 196.) The profits of these and other works, which the public naturally inclined to patronise, from the laudable motives under which they had been undertaken, were so considerable, that, towards the end of 1830, 54,000*l.* of liabilities had been paid off; all of which except about 6,000*l.* had been produced by the sale of his publications. It was in this year, as already mentioned, that sir Walter was attacked by the malady which proved fatal. He was able, however, to attend a county meeting at Jedburgh in March, 1831, to oppose the reform bill. Here he was hissed, which repulse touched him acutely, and coupled with the deep mortification he felt at the ascendancy of the whigs, more than anything, probably accelerated his death. Two daughters, since dead, and two sons, one in the foreign office and the other a major of hussars, survived him. Lady Scott died May 15, 1826. The great contemporary interest excited by the writings of sir Walter has imperceptibly protracted this biographical notice beyond the limits due to its relative importance, or than is perhaps necessary to elucidate the structure of a mind not remarkable for variety or complication. The qualities in which Scott excelled other men were his fertile imagination, retentive memory, and tasteful judgment. These supplied the materials and the artist skill successfully to use them. His genius was more imaginative than reflective; exhibited the power of the ventriloquist, in giving voices to his impersonations, while that of the enchanter remained concealed; and was unlike that of lord Byron, who infused into his characters his own feelings and convictions. His Quixotic admiration of the Waverley age was a poetical fascination, that had been fostered by early impressions and fictitious reading; but even his master passion did not overpower his natural sagacity, so as to render him insensible to the benefits of civilization, or careless of the means of procuring them. His writings are not of a high order of desert; they have no tendency to correct, but cherish human error—to put back, in lieu of advancing the age; and their chief aim appears to have been to profit the author by ministering to the amusement of women and those who read for pastime. In this he was eminently successful, without offensive or noxious accompaniment. He never assails a prejudice, or hurts any feeling, moral or religious. He is generally amusing, sometimes instructs, never corrupts. This is the great excellence of his tales and romantic histories, whose graphic and picturesque descriptions of local scenery—fascinating visions of beauty and loveliness—tumultuous and animated presentment of battles, conflicts, and altercations—coupled with a humour, generous racy, and spontaneous—delineations of character, droll, varied, lively, and original—have the effect of a play or a pantomime, in agreeably transcribing from the realities of life to the regions of fancy, without leaving behind any leprous distilment that may taint the heart or derange the judgment. There are some votaries who prefer his metrical to his prose romances. In the former, he is like his own panoplied knights in armour, stately, imposing, and magnificent, but stiff, vacant, and artificial; while in the latter, whether in hall, court, glen, or bowser—on heath, mountain, lake, or stream—he was natural, free, graceful, and energetic, like his own Rob Roy. Apart from his fictions, he was not a very successful author. He is too careless, incorrect, prejudiced, and superficial for authentic history, biography, or general literature. His chivalry was limited to his writings: in actual life no man appears to have been more keen, provident, shrewd, and self-seeking. His eagerness to amass was so excessive as to over-shoot its mark; for it was his avidity for gain at all points that ruined him. Had he been more moderate—and surely a certain income of 2,000*l.* a year was inducement enough to be so—how much more amiable would have been his biography! What a contrast between the author of Waverley and his gifted countryman, Burns—between the scheming aspirant to aristocratic rank and the noble independence of the peasant bard! Leaving out the fatal propensity to accumulate for the “romantic idealization of Scottish aristocracy”—for the glory of founding a new race of “Scotts of Abbotsford,” which are the excuses adduced for him—the private chaacter of sir Walter was gracious and estimable. In domestic life he was cheerful, hearty, and virtuous; manly and simple in his tastes; free, easy, jocular, and unassuming in his intercourse with all classes and degrees.

29. Report of the sanitary commission of Paris published, stating the number of deaths in that city arising from cholera, between March 26 and August 30, to have been 18,000.

Oct. 1. A subscription raised in the city of London for the erection of almshouses, in lieu of an illumination to celebrate the passing of the Reform Bill.

10. The new formation of the French ministry announced in the Moniteur:—Marshal Soult, president of the council and minister-of-war, vice M. Perier; duke de Broglie, minister of foreign affairs, vice Sebastiani; M. Humann, minister of finance, vice M. Montalivet; M. Thiers, minister of the interior, vice Baron Louis; M. Guizot, minister of public instruction, vice M. Girod de l'Ain; M. Barthe, keeper of the seals and administrator of ecclesiastical affairs. Admiral de Rigny to remain minister of the marine, and M. d'Argout of commerce and public works. Baron Louis and M. Girod de l'Ain were created peers; and a royal ordinance followed, containing a list of the names of sixty-one other individuals created peers.

25. Queen of Spain appointed regent during the indisposition of the king; her majesty granted a general amnesty, and declared in favour of liberal measures.

30. A French squadron arrives at Spithead to co-operate with the English in compelling the Dutch to evacuate Antwerp, in conformity with the settlement of the great powers.

Nov. 1. Charles Pinney, mayor of Bristol during the riots, acquitted of the charge of misdemeanour in neglecting his duty, after a trial of six days before the court of king's bench. It appeared the accused had exerted himself, but had not been zealously supported by the inhabitants, from the unpopularity of the political opinions of their recorder, and, next, from dislike of their close corporation.

4. Died at his house, Russell-square, in his 71st year, CHARLES AMBOTT, baron Tenterden, lord chief justice of the court of king's bench. His health had been declining for some years; and on the commencement of the trial of the Bristol mayor, on the 27th ult., he was taken so ill that he was unable again to appear in court. The ruling passion seems to have been strongly evinced in the last moments of this eminent public functionary. His family were standing round his bed, watching his closing struggles, when he was observed feebly to move his hand along the pillow, as if in the act of writing, and immediately afterwards he was heard to exclaim, almost in his usual tone, "Gentlemen of the Jury, you may retire!" he then closed his eyes and expired. He was born at Canterbury of humble parentage, but received a classic education. At Oxford, where he obtained both a fellowship and tutorship, he was a persevering and successful student, and distinguished by his quiet demeanour. He owed his easy success in life to the patronage of powerful individuals. Mr. Justice Buller, observing his peculiar talents, recommended to him the legal profession; and his excellent treatise on the Shipping Laws obtained for him the favour of lords Eldon and Ellenborough,—under the concurring recommendation of whom he was advanced to the bench; and in 1818 he succeeded the latter as chief justice of England. Lord Tenterden was not an orator, but remarkable for a well-governed temper, learning, judgment, and excellent sense. He was not an advocate calculated to impress a jury, but he was a safe counsellor; and his business at the bar was so considerable that it yielded an average income of 10,000*l*. His court he contrived to keep in admirable order; and the most arrogant spirits were subdued by his grave and well-timed rebuke. As a legislator he had few claims. He was a conservative in church and state; and the last speech he delivered in the house of lords, where he seldom spoke, was against the Reform Bill.

6. A deputation, consisting of forty gentlemen, headed by sir John Key, the lord mayor, waited upon earl Grey, lord Althorp, and lord John Russell, to present their lordships with gold cups, the produce of a penny subscription, to which 300,000 persons had contributed. The cups weigh eighty-five ounces, and contain five pints each. A similar cup was presented to lord chancellor Brougham.

An embargo laid on Dutch vessels by the English and French governments in their respective ports. The king of Holland refused to follow the example; alleging that it "would be unjust to entail on private individuals the consequences of state quarrels."

7. DUCHESS OF BERRI.—This adventurous Bourbon, who had been for some time previously using her endeavours to excite insurrection in the western provinces in favour of her son, was arrested on the 7th at Nantes. She was discovered, with three of her companions, hid in an oven or small closet behind the chimney, the heat of which greatly incommoded them, especially the duchess, who was pressed against the back of it, and compelled them to cry out to surrender. The princess said her pursuers "had made war upon her at la St. Laurent!" She was confined in the castle of Blaye,—where, much to the astonishment of Europe, and the great confusion of the royalists, she gave birth to a daughter, May 10. It was not known she had forsaken her widowhood; but after her accouchement she signed a declaration that she had been privately married in Italy to Count Hector Luchesi Palli, gentleman of the chamber to her brother the king of Naples, and then residing as envoy from that court at the Hague. This lapse having deprived the princess of her influence over the Bourbonites, and of the power of exciting disturbance, the French government gladly availed themselves of the opportunity to set her at liberty. Immediately she recovered, she was put on board a French frigate, along with her infant and attendants, and conveyed to Sicily.

19. The king of the French, whilst on horseback proceeding to the chambers to open the session, was fired at by an unknown person, who immediately escaped by mixing in the crowd. His majesty was unhurt, and proceeded to deliver the royal speech, which chiefly related to the siege of Antwerp, and some important laws to be introduced during the session. M. Dupin, the ministerial candidate, was chosen president by a large majority.

24. The legislative assembly of South Carolina resolved to resist the tariff imposed by the general congress of the United States. They empowered the governor of the state, general Hamilton, to declare its independence of and separation from the federal union, on the first appearance of any military force for its coercion; but they also stated what modifications in the duties on foreign manufactures would satisfy them. President Jackson replied in firm but argumentative and conciliatory addresses. Early in the ensuing year this threatening commotion in the Union was compromised by alterations in the tariff, which provided that duties on imports should be gradually reduced to 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Dec. 3. Parliament dissolved by proclamation.

4. President Jackson delivered his message to congress. He congratulated them on the near prospect of the liquidation of the residue of the public debt, and deprecated the policy of the tariff which prevented a mutual commerce between their own and other countries.

5. An Irish youth, aged nineteen, killed at Farsley, near Leeds. He had given offence to the trade unionists. The perpetrators of the foul act were not detected.

15. During the second day's polling at Sheffield an unfortunate disturbance took place, which occasioned the deaths of five persons.

21. Battle of Konieh (the ancient Joc-nem) between Ibrahim Pasha and Redschid Pasha, the grand vizier. The victories of Ibrahim in the preceding year had opened to him the way across the Taurus, and, descending into the plains of Caramania, he took up a strong position behind the town of Konieh, where the enemy could reach him only through dangerous defiles. His army was inferior in number to that of the Turks, but hardened to war, accustomed to victory, and led by skilful officers. The vizier, apprehensive that Ibrahim might receive reinforcements, attacked the centre of the Egyptian position; which Ibrahim foreseeing, he fell suddenly on the Turkish flanks, broke them, surrounded the vizier and made him prisoner. This signal defeat caused the utmost alarm at Constantinople, there being now no obstacle between Ibrahim and the shores of the Bosphorus.

24. SURRENDER OF ANTWERP.—The French army, amounting to near 60,000 men, commanded by marshal Gerard, entered Belgium on the 13th ult., and on the 30th the marshal summoned general Chassé, in the name of the two coercing powers, England and France, to surrender the citadel. General Chassé refused, and declared his intention to hold out to the last extremity. After some negotiation, it was settled that the city of Antwerp should be considered neutral by both sides. On the 4th inst., the French having dug their entrenchments and prepared their artillery, opened a fire in volleys with about 160 pieces. The Dutch returned it with spirit, and many of the French were killed and wounded. The operations were carried on with vigour on both sides till the 23rd, when the besiegers having laid the interior of the fort in ruins and effected a breach with the intention of carrying it by storm, general Chassé surrendered on the following day. By the terms of the capitulation the garrison were held prisoners of war, till the surrender of Lillo and Liefkenshoek, two other Belgic fortresses on the Scheldt, in the possession of the Dutch. The king of Holland, however, refused to allow of the surrender of these forts; upon which the garrison was marched into France and the French army evacuated Belgium.

31. Ferdinand of Spain rescinds and protests against a decree extorted from him while he lay dangerously ill, by which the Salic law had been renewed, and his brother, Don Carlos, declared his successor, to the exclusion of his own daughter.

MARRIAGES.—A German periodical, the Hesperus, contains the results of some curious inquiries on this subject. It appears that to 1,000 marriages there were born in the Two Sicilies 5,546 children; in France, 4,118; in England, 3,365; in Zealand, 3,439. So that the Two Sicilies and Zealand being the extremes, marriages are less prolific in the country lies nearer the north. The writer also shows what might have been foreseen, that there has been a growing excess of males over females since the peace.

CRIME IN FRANCE.—Out of every 100 persons accused, 61 are regularly condemned. Out of the whole population, one in every 4,460 inhabitants is accused. In every 100 crimes, 25 are against the person, 75 against property. Experience shows, that the number of murders is annually nearly the same; and, that the instruments or means employed are always in the same proportion. The inclination to commit crime is at its greatest in men about the age of twenty-five; in women, five years later. The proportion of men and women accused is four to one. In summer more crimes are committed against the person, fewer against property; the reverse is the case in winter.

STEAM CARRIAGES.—A parliamentary committee appointed to inquire into steam carriages, concluded their report with the following summary:—1. That carriages can be propelled by steam on common roads at an average rate of ten miles per hour. 2. That at this rate they have conveyed upwards of fourteen passengers. 3. That their weight, including engine, fuel, water, and attendants, may be under three tons. 4. That they can ascend and descend hills of considerable inclination with facility and ease. 5. That they are perfectly safe for passengers. 6. That they need not be nuisances to the public. 7. That they will become a speedier and cheaper mode of conveyance than carriages drawn by horses. 8. That, as they admit of greater breadth of tire than other carriages, and as the roads are not acted on so injuriously as by the feet of horses in common draught, such carriages will cause less wear of roads than coaches drawn by horses.

SOCIAL ECONOMY.—The inquiries of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the operation of the Poor Laws have disclosed some extraordinary features in the condition of different classes of society. It appears that, in many gaols, criminals have a greater allowance of food than that given to paupers, and that paupers in their turn are better fed than independent labourers. The following results have been arrived at by Mr. Chadwick, which, if correctly deduced, show that the scale of allowances is proportioned to the demerit rather than the desert of the receivers. Of solid food weekly, the independent agricultural labourer receives 122 ounces; the soldier, 156; the able-bodied pauper, 151; the suspected thief, 181; the convicted thief, 280; the transported thief, 330 ounces.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Dublin, Alex. Nimmo, 49, eminent civil engineer; upwards of 30 piers or harbours on the Irish coast were built under his superintendence. At Paris, Admiral sir Alexander Cochrane, 73, experienced naval officer, and ninth son of Thomas, earl of Dundonald. At Lisson Grove, by his own hand, James Fletcher, 21, author of a "History of Poland," a young man of promising talent, who had become dependent on the uncertain gains of literature. Joseph Munden, 73, popular comic actor. Joseph Brasbridge, 90, a retired silversmith of Fleet-street and author of an autobiography. At Weimar, the celebrated Goethe, 82, author of Werther, and patriarch of the mystical writers of Germany. At his cottage in the vale of Evesham, Muzio Clementi, 81, celebrated pianist, and according to Dr. Crotch, father of pianoforte music. At Fontainebleau, the Rev. Charles Colton, author of Lacon, &c., and an eccentric character, who committed suicide rather than submit to a surgical operation rendered unavoidable by disease. Sir Richard Rime, 72, chief magistrate of the police office, Bow-street. Sir Richard was a native of Scotland, and at one period of life a journeyman saddler in London. After an advantageous marriage, the successful pursuit of business, and filling almost every parochial office, he was, at the instance of the duke of Northumberland, placed in the commission of the peace. He obtained the flattering notice of the prince of Wales, while in his original employment, and distinguished himself as a magistrate: at the Queen's funeral, and in the apprehension of the Cato-street conspirators. At Paris, M. Champollion, 42, celebrated Egyptian scholar. At Dawlish, Mr William Grant, 77, late master of the rolls. John Taylor, 76, formerly editor of the Sun newspaper and author of "Monsieur Tesson." Charles Butler, 83, eminent juriconsult, and author of "Home Bibles," &c. At Montpellier, near Bristol, Miss Anna Maria Porter, the accomplished and popular novelist. John Heley Hutchison, earl of Donoughmore, 75, a distinguished military officer, who, on the death of general Abercrombie, succeeded that gallant officer in the command of the British army in Egypt. Sir John Carr, 60, late popular tourist and author of books of Travels. At the palace of Schoenbrunn, near Vienna, of consumption, the duke of Reichstadt, 21, the only legitimate child of Napoleon Buonaparte. Near Chelmsford, sir John Tyrell, 76, lineally descended from sir Walter Tyrell, who accidentally slew king William Rufus, and whose descendants for fifteen generations uniformly received the grade of knighthood. Viscount Dillon, 54, author of "The Tactics of Adrian," &c. George Bridgman, 80, court newsmen in the latter part of George III.'s reign. Rev. Adam Clarke, 72, Wesleyan preacher and biblical scholar. At Chelsea College, sir Everard Home, 76, surgeon to that hospital, and distinguished medical writer. Priscilla Wakefield, 82, author of many popular tracts for young persons. At Bath, James Stephens, 73, late master in chancery, and fellow labourer with Clarkson and Wilberforce, whose sister he married, in the struggle for the abolition of the African slave trade. Mr. Stephens was an able writer and speaker, and author of the celebrated Orders in Council, framed to meet the anti-commercial Milan and Berlin decrees of Napoleon. Sir John Leslie, 56, professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, and distinguished writer on mathematical and physical science. At Vienna, Andrew Count O'Reilly, 92, general of cavalry in the Austrian army, and considered the last of the class of Irish officers, the contemporaries or elèves of the Dauns, Lacys, Loudons, and Browns, so renowned in the wars of Frederick II. and Maria Theresa. At Boston, in America, Dr. Spurzheim, 56, the disciple of Dr. Gall, and zealous teacher of phrenology. At Pimlico, Thomas Hardy, 82, formerly secretary to the London Corresponding Society and the subject of an unsuccessful government prosecution (p. 590.) It being considered by the friends of Mr. Hardy that the justice of his political views had been confirmed by the Reform Act, his interment in Bunhill Fields was made the occasion of a funeral oration, after the fashion of the French. At Paris, Jean Baptiste Say, a writer who had zealously laboured to spread the economical principles of Dr. Adam Smith among his countrymen.

A.D. 1833. ELECTION AND COMPOSITION OF THE FIRST REFORM PARLIAMENT.—

The elections in the last month of the past year were all over in less than three weeks after the dissolution of parliament. The quietness and dispatch with which this national business was transacted contrasted favourably with the fifteen days' riot, licentiousness and immorality, which prevailed under the former system. Even the opponents of the Reform Acts were constrained to admit the superiority of their practical working in elections. By excluding non-resident voters, by limiting the duration of the poll to two days, and increasing the number of polling places, the expenses to candidates were diminished, and increased facilities afforded to electors. As might be expected, the elections ran strongly in favour of the ministers, to whom the people were under such especial obligations. The numerical strength of the different parties in the new house of commons was supposed to be—Ministerial members, 400; Tories or Conservatives, 150; Radicals, Ultra Liberals, Independent, Irish Repealers, &c., about 100. Considering the latter division reformers, the subjoined statement exhibits, under the heads of Reformers and Conservatives, the number of each class returned by the counties, cities, boroughs, and universities of the United Kingdom:—

	Ref.	Cons.
England , County Members . . .	102	42
Cities and Boroughs . . .	264	59
Universities . . .		4
Wales , County Members . . .	8	7
Cities and Boroughs . . .	11	3
Scotland , County Members . . .	22	8
Cities and Boroughs . . .	22	1
Ireland , County Members . . .	48	16
Cities and Boroughs . . .	32	7
Dublin University . . .		2
Total Members . . .	509	149

Of the whole 658 members, about 280 had not sat in the preceding parliament, and few of the 280 in any parliament. Of the 380 members who had been in the last parliament and were also returned for this, most of them sat for new places. Of the 80 Irish reformers, 38 were pledged repealers. The universities appear to have been most deeply conservative, the Scotch burghs the least so. The English counties were more conservative than the boroughs, but not so conservative as the Welsh counties, which exceeded the conservatism of the Irish counties. The subjoined statement exhibits the number of counties and boroughs, the number of registered electors, and the number of members returned in the general election of 1832:—

	Electors.	Mems.
40 English Counties . . .	344,564	144
185 Do. Boroughs . . .	974,649	397
12 Welsh Counties . . .	25,815	15
14 Do. Boroughs . . .	11,309	14
30 Scotch Counties . . .	33,114	30
76 Do. Boroughs . . .	31,332	76
39 Irish Counties . . .	60,607	64
34 Do. Boroughs . . .	31,543	41

Of the 114 counties and divisions in the United Kingdom, 60 were contested; in 54, no contest. Of the 254 cities, boroughs, and towns, 190 were contested; in 64 no contest. In the first session of the new parliament there were 64 members holding commissions in the army, 19 in the navy, and 45 in the militia and yeomanry; 68 holding civil or judicial offices, having pensions, grants, or emoluments, to the amount of 101,288*l.*—(Parl. Pap. No. 671, Sess. 1833.) The number of members connected by blood or marriage with peers was 186. Those possessing church patronage were 79; merchants and traders, 33; manufacturers, 16; bankers, 33; barristers, 64; law students, 2; solicitors, 5; literary and political writers, 6; and persons of no profession, 416.

Jan. 1. A destructive conflagration at Liverpool, in which from fifteen to twenty warehouses were destroyed, with property to the value of 300,000*l.*

2. POPULAR EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

M. Guizot introduced into the French chamber of deputies, in a speech of great ability, his scheme of popular instruction, which passed into a law in the course of the session. It establishes three descriptions of schools; Elementary schools, of which every commune or parish is bound to maintain one, except when two or more small communes join to maintain the same school; Middle schools, for the higher branches of education, of which there is to be one in every departmental town, and in every parish having more than 6000 inhabitants; and Normal schools, for the training of teachers, of which there is also to be one for each department. The elementary education is to consist of reading, writing, French grammar, and arithmetic, together with moral and religious instruction. The masters in all these schools are to have small salaries, paid by the parish or department, but are to derive the chief part of their emoluments from fees. Each parish school is to be under the immediate management of a communal committee, of which the curé of the parish is to be ex officio a member, and which is also to contain one minister of each of the other religious persuasions that may exist in the commune. The whole system is placed under the direction of the member of the cabinet known in France as the minister of public instruction. The plan, in its leading principles and details, is borrowed from that which has been for some years in operation in Prussia, to which country M. Cousin was sent by the government to examine and report on it.

6. Crown of France claimed by Joseph Buonaparte, ex-king of Spain, as having become the representative of the imperial dynasty, by the death of young Napoleon.

10. Death of Joshua Brookes, F.R.S., aged seventy-two. This celebrated anatomist, during the forty years in which he taught anatomy, educated not less than 7000 pupils, many of whom attained eminence in their profession. His museum, which was only inferior to that of Hunter in the number and variety of specimens, was, unhappily, in his declining years, dispersed by the hammer of the auctioneer.

15. A difference between the French chambers of peers and deputies, in consequence of the determination of the latter to allow no amendment to a bill they had passed, by which the observance of the anniversary of the death of Louis XVI., as a day of national mourning, is abolished.

20. The Hungarian diet opened by the emperor in person. One of the earliest proceedings of this assembly was the adoption of a resolution recommending the publicity of discussion in the diet, and the establishment of the liberty of the press.

21. Seven persons killed by the explosion of six powder mills at Dartford, in Kent. 2500 lbs. of powder exploded. The shock was felt at Greenwich, a distance of ten miles.

29. MEETING OF THE REFORMED PARLIAMENT.—The new parliament was opened by commission, and the commons proceeded to the election of their speaker. Mr. Manners Sutton was proposed by lord Morpeth and sir F. Biddell; Mr. Littleton by Mr. Hume and Mr. O'Connell. After a debate of three hours, a division took place, which terminated in favour of Mr. Sutton by a majority of 241 to 31. Mr. Sutton's election was opposed because he was an anti-reformer; he was supported by ministers on the ground of his ability and experience, and also of economy, as, by his re-election to the office of speaker, the retiring pension to which he had become entitled would be saved. On February 5th the king delivered his speech in person. He lamented the continuance of civil war in Portugal, and the necessity of coercive interference, in concert with France, to effect a definitive arrangement between Belgium and Holland. It announced that the approaching termination of the charter of the Bank of England and East India Company would render necessary a revision of these establishments. It called attention to the state of the churches in England and Ireland, especially in reference to the evils of tithes and the distribution of their revenues; but suggested that the reforms in the two churches would require separate consideration. Lastly, the increasing spirit of insubordination and violence in Ireland was emphatically dwelt upon, and the necessity suggested of intrusting the crown with additional powers for punishing the disturbers of the public peace, and for strengthening the legislative union between the two kingdoms. In the low's the address was agreed to, but in the continuous amendments were moved, having for their objects to couple inquiry with coercion in the treatment of Ireland, and which gave rise to a discussion that occupied the house five nights. Amendments negatived by large majorities.

31. In Murray v. Heath the lord chancellor disallowed the customary right claimed by the defendant to retain a certain number of copies of all engravings executed by him for the plaintiff.

Several incendiary fires occurred during this month.

Feb. 5. The Hibernia, capt. Brend, from Liverpool to New South Wales, with 232 persons on board, of whom 208 were passengers going out as settlers, destroyed at sea by fire, kindled through the negligence of the second mate, in W. long. 22°, and S. lat. 4°. 150 lives lost, though the inefficiency of the boats to contain more than a third of the people on board.

6. Death of Admiral lord EXMOUTH, aged seventy-six. His father, Samuel Fellow, was a Cornish gentleman, and in that county he finished his education. He entered the navy in his fourteenth year, and attained the rank of captain in 1782. In 1796 he was raised to a baronetcy for the personal humanity and bravery he exhibited in saving the crew of an East Indiaman, which, in a heavy gale, had been driven upon the rocks near Plymouth citadel. In 1816 he concluded a treaty with the Algerines, being then the admiral on the Mediterranean station; but the treaty being almost immediately after violated, the result was the bombardment of Algiers, in which the admiral was slightly wounded, and his coat cut in pieces by grape and musket shot. For this action he was created a viscount; the city of London presented him with a magnificent sword; and the powers whose subjects (1200 Christians) had been liberated severally sent him their orders of knighthood. The admiral expired at his house at Teignmouth, after a long and severe illness.

7. T. H. Goldsmid, of the Hebrew persuasion, called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn: he was the first of that creed who entered the profession.

Alderman WATKINMAN died in his seventieth year. He was a native of Wales. After being supported at school by an uncle, he came to London, where he entered into the service of a linen-draper. When of age he commenced business at the south end of Fleet-street, where his monument now stands. Under the excitement of the French revolution he became a politician, advocating at that early period parliamentary reform, which he just lived to see accomplished. In 1818 he supplanted sir William Curtis in the representation of the city; was sheriff in 1829, and in 1823 was chosen lord mayor.

12. Lord Althorp obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relative to the Irish church establishment. He estimated the revenues of the church at about 800,000*l.*; proposed the abolition of first-fruits and of church-cess (rates); the taxation of benefices above 200*l.* and of bishops' incomes; the consolidation of sees, and the grant of episcopal leases in perpetuity.—(See Aug. 29.)

14. QUAKERS' AFFIRMATION.—Joseph Pease, a Quaker, returned for the southern division of the county of Durham, having claimed on the 7th to be admitted to take his seat on his affirmation, a committee was appointed to inquire into his right, so to do. Upon the committee's report, the commons resolved that Mr. Pease was entitled to take his seat upon making his affirmation and declaration, instead of taking the usual oaths. It appeared there was only one case on the Journals, in which a similar question of a Quaker on his affirmation had occurred; that of John Archdale, returned for Chipping Wycombe in 1699. Quakers of late have in several instances been admitted barristers on making their affirmation in lieu of taking the usual oaths. A Quaker, since the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, has served the office of sheriff of York on his affirmation. By statutes of the last and present reign their affirmation is admitted in all cases, criminal, civil, and official.

15. IRISH DISTURBANCES BILL.—Earl Grey obtained leave to bring in a bill for the suppression of local disturbances and dangerous associations, in Ireland. His lordship stated that between 1st January and the end of December, 1832, the number of homicides was 242; of robberies, 1179; of burglaries, 401; of burnings, 568; of houghing cattle, 290; of serious assaults, 161; of riots, 203; of illegal rescues, 353; of illegal notices, 2094; of illegal meetings, 427; of injuries to property, 796; of attacks on houses, 723; of firing with intent to kill, 328; of robbery of arms, 117; of administering unlawful oaths, 163; of resistance to legal process, 8; of turning up land, 20; of resistance to tithes, 50; of taking forcible possession, 2; making altogether a total of 9002 crimes committed in one year; and all of these crimes of a description connected with, and growing out of, the disturbed state of the country. The bill passed rapidly through its several stages in the lords, but it was pertinaciously resisted in the commons, especially by the Irish members. Ultimately, the third reading was carried March 29th, by 345 to 86. Its provisions were similar to those of for-met insurrection acts; empowering the lord lieutenant to prohibit public meetings considered dangerous; subjecting the inhabitants of proclaimed districts to martial law; prohibiting them from leaving their houses between sunset and sunrise; suspending the writ of habeas corpus, and authorizing domiciliary visits by magistrates. Amendments were carried in the commons restricting the jurisdiction of courts-martial to offences accompanied by violence or thefts, and excluding the collection of tithes from the operation of the act. The act to continue in force till August 1, 1834.

20. ATTENDANCE AND PETITIONS.—On the motion of lord Althorp the commons agreed to meet every day except Saturday, at twelve o'clock, for private business and petitions, and to sit till three, unless the business should be sooner disposed of. At this early meeting twenty members instead of forty to form a house; and a quarter past five o'clock, instead of four, was fixed for the house assembling in the evening. It was also resolved that a select committee should, in future, be appointed at the commencement of each session to classify all petitions presented to the house, and to order the printing of such of them at length, or in abstract, as appeared to them to require it. These regulations were intended to lessen the evil of nocturnal legislation, and for bringing more readily under the notice of the house the mass of petitions requiring attention, and which had enormously increased. In the five years ending in 1789 the public petitions presented amounted only to 880; in 1805 they had increased to 1026; in 1815 to 4498; in 1831 to 24,492.

Mar. 2. General Jackson became a second time president of the United States of America.

5. Died, in his 52nd year, the earl of DUDLEY, a man who acquired distinction in the house of commons as Mr. Ward, and who filled the office of foreign secretary during the short ministry of Mr. Canning. His lordship expressed himself much alarmed at the republican tendency of the Reform Bill, and delivered his last, perhaps his ablest, speech against that measure in 1831. He possessed powerful talents, varied accomplishments, and a generous disposition, but his manners had always been so much marked by absence of mind, irresolution and infirmity of purpose, that few were astonished at the melancholy circumstances under which he was withdrawn from society. He experienced a succession of paralytic attacks, and had latterly sunk into that state of imbecility which Dean Swift long apprehended, and in the end fell into, as the most dismal of human visitations. The earl's titles have expired with him, except the barony of Ward, which has devolved to a clergyman.

16. At the sale of the chattels of the late lord Eldin at Edinburgh, the drawing-room, in which the bidders had assembled, to the number of 200, fell in. Mr. Smith a banker, was killed, and several others seriously injured.

22. New York papers of this date announce the termination of the differences between the general government and South Carolina, in consequence of the passing of the new Tariff, by which the present duties are to be gradually reduced till they reach 20 per cent. ad valorem.

29. Died, in his 63th year, SAMUEL DREW, M.A., a well-known metaphysical writer. He was the son of a common labourer at St. Austell, in Cornwall, and at the early age of six he was taken from school and sent to work at a mill, where tinners refined their ore, and earned twopence a day. He subsequently became a book-binder, and, while so occupied in business on his own account, he prepared and published his "Essay on the Human Soul," which first brought him into public notice, and which, notwithstanding the dryness of the subject, has gone through five editions in this country and four in America, and has been translated into French. This work and some other metaphysical treatises procured him the honour of M.A. from Aberdeen. In the beginning of 1819 Mr. Drew removed to Liverpool, and thence to London to edit the Imperial Magazine, and to exercise a general superintendence over the works of the Caxton press: duties, which he continued to discharge until the beginning of the month in which he died.

In the last week of March London witnessed two occurrences seldom seen together,—a deep fall of snow and a glut of mackerel.

Several meetings have been held to obtain a repeal of the assessed taxes; also relative to the Factory Bill.

During the month, in consequence of lord Durham's resignation, on account of illness, the earl of Ripon became lord privy seal; Mr. Stanley, colonial secretary; sir John Hobhouse, secretary for Ireland; and Mr. Ellice, secretary-at-war.

April 3. A serious riot at Frankfurt, in the course of which the people, headed by the students, took the guard-house, and liberated the persons confined for political offences. Several lives were lost, and many persons wounded, in the struggle between the students and the military.

11. Died, in his 88th year, the rev. ROWLAND HILL, the celebrated minister of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road. Mr.

Hill was the sixth son of sir Rowland Hill, and uncle to lord Hill, the present commander-in-chief. He was brought up for the church, in which he received deacon's orders; and, although he afterwards separated from it, he was always tenacious of his clerical character as an episcopal minister, and wished rather to be considered a non-conformist than a dissenter. His familiar anecdotal style of oratory was addressed to the common people, among whom he was an eminently popular preacher. As a writer he is chiefly known by the "Village Dialogues," a religious work characterized by the same qualities as his preaching, and which has been surpassed by few books in popularity.

14. Day of thanksgiving for the cessation of the cholera morbus.

16. Mr. Hawes, the member for Lambeth, in presenting a petition to the commons in favour of the removal of the disabilities of the Jews, repelled the charge that they did not employ themselves in useful pursuits, by showing that there were in France 1232 Jewish landed proprietors, 796 engaged in the military profession, 7960 artisans, and 220 manufacturers.

19. Died admiral lord GAMBIER, in his 76th year, at Iver. He was the grandson of a French protestant whom the revocation of the edict of Nantes drove from his country. While a lord of the admiralty, he compiled a code of signals that superseded those introduced by James II., when duke of York. In 1807 admiral Gambier was sent to demand possession of the Danish fleet, for the successful performance of which service he was raised to the peerage and offered a pension of 20000*l.* which he declined. In his latter years he had been much occupied with the various religious societies over which he presided, and to which he was a liberal patron.

23. The fleet of Don Pedro being in a state of mutiny for want of pay, and on account of the dismissal of admiral Sartorius for demanding it, sir J. M. Doyle and captain Crosbie were despatched on board the Rainha, the former to arrest Sartorius and the latter to supersede him. But sir John was himself arrested and detained, and captain Crosbie threatened with a court-martial. The differences were afterwards adjusted by a partial compliance with the demands of the fleet, and the continuance of Sartorius in the command.

29. On the motion for the repeal of the house and window taxes in the commons, lord Althorp moved a counter-resolution, declaring its inexpediency, as also of that for the reduction of the duty on malt, which had been carried against ministers, asserting that it would become necessary to supply the deficiency in the revenue by an income tax. The counter-resolution was carried.

29. Sir John Hobhouse resigns his office and his seat for Westminster, in consequence of being unwilling to embarrass the ministry by voting for the repeal of the assessed taxes, to which he had pledged himself to his constituents. Mr. Littleton was appointed secretary for Ireland, in the room of sir John.

Influenza was very prevalent this month. According to the Medical Gazette of May 4th, it has been a hundred-fold more prevalent than the cholera was, and more fatal in London within the last 14 days than that disease within an equal period.

May 7. Gross outrage on the person of the president of the United States, by a man named Randolph, who, after charging general Jackson with wanton persecution, tweaked his nose.

10. Election for Westminster terminated: for colonel De Lacy Evans, radical, 2927; for sir John Hobhouse, ministerialist, 2775; for Mr. Escott, tory, 738. Sir John for 15 years had been one of the popular representatives of Westminster.

Duel at Exeter, between sir John Jeffcott, chief judge of the vice-admiralty court at Sierra Leone, and Dr. Hennis, in which the latter was mortally wounded. The coroner's inquest returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against all the parties concerned.

11. Lord Teynham, and a tailor named Donlan, tried in the court of king's bench, on a charge of swindling one Didymus Longford out of 1,400*l.*, under the pretence of procuring him a place under government. Both the defendants found guilty.

13. A public meeting having been called in Coldbath Fields to adopt measures for choosing a National Convention, about 1,000 persons assembled with banners, &c., in dispersing whom, much violence was committed on both sides, and one policeman, named Robert Culley, was mortally wounded with a dagger. After four days' investigation, a coroner's inquest returned a verdict of Justifiable Homicide; which verdict was quashed on the 30th, in the court of king's bench, on the motion of the solicitor-general.

14. London and Birmingham railway began.

Mr. secretary Stanley, in an able address, introduced resolutions for the abolishing of colonial slavery.—(See Aug. 29.)

15. Died EDMUND KEAN, the celebrated tragedian, in his 46th year. He was the son of a tailor, and, after struggling through great difficulties and distresses in the early part of his career, he made his début on the London boards in 1814, in the character of Shylock, his performance of which immediately established him in that rank as an actor which he ever after maintained. His great success supplied him with the means of vicious indulgence, which he had not fortitude to resist, and by which his faculties were impaired, his health ruined, and his property dissipated. He is said to have received since 1814, in England and America, 176,000*l.*, averaging 9,000*l.* a-year.

16. Mr. Cobbett, in the commons, moved a long resolution condemnatory of Peel's currency bill of 1819. To this bill he attributed the subsequent distresses of the country in not having been accompanied with a reduction of the public debt, and an equitable adjustment of all contracts; and he called for an address, praying the king to dismiss sir R. Peel from the Privy Council. After sir R. Peel had spoken in defence, the motion was negatived by 298 to 4; and a motion by lord Althorp, that the proceedings on the resolution be expunged from the minutes, was carried by a like majority.

18. A large meeting on Newhall-hill, near Birmingham, to petition the king to dismiss his ministers; Mr. Attwood and Mr. O'Connell addressed the multitude in favour of the petition.

21. A treaty signed in London by the plenipotentiaries of Britain, France, and Holland, in which the latter cedes to Belgium the free navigation of the Scheldt and the Meuse; and a free passage through Maestricht. Other points in dispute between the two kingdoms remain unsettled.

An affray between the soldiery and the inhabitants of Neustadt, in Rhenish Bavaria, while attempting to celebrate, a second time, the festival of Hambach. Upwards of 100 persons killed, and one cavalry regiment refused to fire on the people.

25. Trial in the court of king's bench, Re v. Phillips, arising out of the revival of the calumnious libel on the duke of Cumberland, relative to the death of his valet, Sellis. The duke appeared as a witness; he detailed to the jury the circumstances of the affair as before mentioned (May 31, 1810), and exhibited the marks on his head of the blows inflicted by the assassin; which left no doubt of Sellis being his own destroyer, and the correctness of the coroner's verdict to that effect. The jury immediately found the defendant guilty.

27. A busy week commenced at court. The king's birth-day celebrated by a splendid drawing room and a grand dinner. The next day, a levee, and a dinner to the Jockey Club. Prince George of Cumberland's birth-day celebrated at Kew. A juvenile ball at St. James's in honour of the birth-day of Princess Victo-nia. A dinner given by his Majesty to the Nutty Sewander club. The queen visits the Zoological Gardens.

31. Death of major-general sir John Malcolm. This distinguished soldier, statesman, and author, was born on the farm of Burnfoot, near Langholm, in 1769. He was scarcely fourteen when he was sent out to India, and rapidly made those acquirements which formed the basis of his future distinction. Having highly distinguished himself at the fall of Seringapatam in 1799, and on other occasions, he was appointed by lord Wellesley ambassador to Persia, which had never been visited by an English ambassador since the time of Queen Elizabeth. This and his subsequent missions to that country, which were chiefly designed to counteract French influence, he discharged with ability and success. In 1827, he was prevailed upon to accept the government of Bombay, and, after effecting very important services, finally returned to this country in 1831. Sir John was the author of several literary works on the East, enumerated among the "Men of Letters" of this reign. To a subscription to a monument to his memory the pasha of Egypt subscribed 100*l*.

31. Lord Althorp, in the commons, proposed a series of resolutions as the basis of the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England.—(See Aug. 29.)

June 4. Died, in his fifty-eighth year, Peter, lord King, who obtained much notoriety upwards of twenty years ago, by his attempts to enforce the payment of his rents in gold, in lieu of paper; latterly, he had been distinguished by his sharp attacks on the episcopal bench, and on all questions relating to the temporalities of the church. He was a man of great shrewdness, and the author of several works, of which the most important is a "Life of John Locke." The materials for this work were in his own possession, the great moral philosopher having been uncle to lord King's great-grandfather, Peter, first lord King, the lord-chancellor.

13. Mr. C. Grant, in the commons, brought forward the resolutions on the renewal of the charter of the East India company, and the future government of India.—(See Aug. 29.)

21. The recorder of London resigned his office on account of the feeling excited by the narrow escape of a criminal named Cox from being hanged, through his inadvertence.

July 2. Hungerford market opened.

8. DECLINE OF TURKEY.—A secret treaty, bearing this date, negotiated at Constantinople, between Russia and the Porte, Russia engaged to furnish Turkey with such forces as her exigencies may at any time require; and the Porte engaged, at the demand of Russia, to close the Dardanelles against any foreign vessels of war. This suspicious alliance acquired the title of the treaty of "Unkjar Skelessi," from the name of the place where the united forces of Turkey and Russia had encamped. Such a treaty between a strong and weak state threatened to make the latter a dependancy of the former, and naturally excited jealousy among the European governments of the ulterior designs of the emperor Nicholas. But, however dangerous the connexion, it was rendered almost necessary to the existence of the Turkish power by the humiliating disasters of the preceding year. The army of a rebel vassal, that had advanced from Egypt and Syria, had conquered a great part of her Asiatic dominions, and was within a few days' march of the capital. The victory of Konieh (see Dec. 21, 1832) had laid at the foot of the conqueror the whole of Asia Minor, where there no longer remained any means of defence, and where the mass of the population was indifferent to the contest, or prepossessed in favour of the invader. Smyrna and Magnesia, both great cities, surrendered at the first summons of an Egyptian officer, accompanied by a handful of men. Meanwhile Ibrahim marched forward to Kutaiah, whence he menaced Bursa and Constantinople itself. At this crisis, the sultan Mahmoud applied for the immediate aid of his late enemy, the emperor of Russia. The latter readily listened to the application; and in the month of February an auxiliary naval force had anchored in the Bosphorus, within nine miles of Constantinople. Previously to this arrival, the other great powers had become apprehensive, and France sent admiral Roussin to Constantinople, to try to conclude peace between Mehemet Ali and the Sultan, without the intervention of the Russian arms. Terms were proposed to the Egyptian pasha, who insisted on the cession of Tarsus and Adana; the sultan hesitated—consented,—then refused. In the interim, a second Russian squadron had anchored in the Bosphorus with 5,000 troops on board, while others had crossed the Pruth and were advancing towards the Turkish frontier. The diplomacy of all Europe beset the Divan—their united voices warned Mahmoud against his dangerous ally,—and at last, on the 4th May, he consented to cede all the territories demanded by Mehemet Ali. The Egyptians immediately after began to retire from Asia Minor. But the Russians remained in the neighbourhood of Constantinople till July and did not sail from the Bosphorus till the 11th, three days after the signature of the treaty of Unkjar Skelessi; the com-lined English and French fleets continuing to cruise off the Turkish coast till the Czar's forces had departed. By the treaty concluded with Mehemet Ali, the pasha has become incomparably a more powerful sovereign than his old master, the Sultan. He is now left in undisputed possession of Egypt, the fine island of Candia (Crete), the territories of Damascus, Tripoli in Syria, Seyd, and Safed; the districts of Adana, Jerusalem, and Naplous are also ceded to him, with the privilege of conducting pilgrims to the holy places; and his son Ibrahim is invested with the title and power of Sheikh-al-harem of Mecca and of Djidda. Mehemet Ali has now an excellent frontier, easily defended against the Turks; is master of some of the finest seaports in the world; and with the district of Adana, which he has ostensibly undertaken to farm for the sultan, he will have an invaluable supply of timber for the growing Egyptian navy. Both the pasha and the sultan have been great reformers on the European model, equal in zeal, but unequal in success, and perhaps in ability, and the favourableness of their position. Sultan Mahmoud has had more intractable interests to deal with: his destruction of the Janissaries was ably effected, but his precipitate attacks on the immunities of the privileged classes—the Ayans, or feudal lords, the municipal corporations, and oulmas, or doctors of law and religion, weakened his executive power, by rendering these powerful orders discontented; while his loss of authority with the Turkish aristocracy was not compensated to him by conciliating the masses, who were too ignorant to appreciate the risks he was incurring, and the sacrifices he was making for their benefit. It follows, that the Turkish empire—if such it can be considered, after the severance of Egypt, Greece, Algiers, Moldavia, and Wallachia—is disorganised and without strength; and only exists because it cannot be easily, nor perhaps, without a general war, partitioned among the great powers who hold it in trust, and with mutual jealousy watch over its preservation.

28. DON PEDRO ENTERS LISBON.—After the elapse of a year, and a succession of desperate conflicts between the beleaguered Pedroites in Oporto, and the Miguelites, the war took an unexpected turn in favour of Donna Maria. This was chiefly owing to the gallantry of captain Charles Napier, who had succeeded Sartorius in the command of the Pedroite squadron, and the enterprise of the brave constitutionalist count Villa Flor. On the 21st ult., Napier took on board his ships, at Oporto, 3500 troops, commanded by Villa Flor and the marquis of Palmella, and landed them at Villa Real, after dislodging the Miguelite garrison by the fire from his squadron. The inhabitants of the Algarves seemed more favourably disposed towards the cause of the young queen than in other parts of Portugal, and Villa Flor, dividing his troops into two columns, advanced towards Lisbon. Meanwhile, captain, now admiral Napier, sailed along the coast, destroying the batteries and gun-boats of the enemy, till, July 2, he came in sight of the Miguelite fleet near Cape St. Vincent. His force was 278 guns and 2,500 men; that of the Miguelites, 360 guns and 3,250 men. Notwithstanding the disparity of force, Napier bore gallantly up to the attack, being favoured by a fresh breeze which had sprung up after the steam-vessels, attached to his squadron, had refused to expose themselves by towing his ships into action, unless paid 2,000*l.* each. The Miguelites discharged their broadsides into the Pedroites, but not a gun was fired by Napier until he had brought his own ship alongside the Rainha, 74, which he boarded, sword in hand, in the dress of a common sailor, accompanied by a chosen band. Almost at the instant, his son, in another frigate, ran on the lee-quarter of the Rainha and also boarded her. The Rainha mustered 750 men, and the conflict of cutlasses, daggers, and crow-bars was terrific; but in less than ten minutes, in the midst of the shouts of the victors and the groans of the dying, the constitutional flag was hoisted over that of Miguel. The rest of Miguel's ships were panic-struck. The Miguelite admiral did not do his duty; he kept his huge ship out of action as long as he could, and surrendered after receiving one broadside. The whole of the Miguelite squadron was captured, except a corvette and two brigs, and carried into Lagos bay. Events followed on land hardly less brilliant. Villa Flor attacked the Miguelites in the vicinity of Lisbon, and defeated them, though double in number to his own troops, and killed their ablest general, Telles Jordas. The night after this defeat, the Miguelite governor evacuated Lisbon, and Villa Flor entered the capital. The citizens opened the prisons of 5,000 persons confined for political offences, and proclaimed Donna Maria. While these advantages were gaining in the south, the Miguelites, directed by marshal Bourmont, were making desperate but unsuccessful efforts to carry Oporto by storm. News arriving of the capture of Lisbon, Don Pedro left Oporto for the capital, to which he made his triumphal entrance on the 28th. This now became the centre of military operations, and the year closed, leaving Don Miguel still with large forces, and the country, except in Porto and Lisbon, generally devoted to his cause.

29. A strong sensation in London from its having been found that sir John Key, one of the city members, was interested in government contracts for paper, and that a son of his, a minor, had been appointed to a responsible situation in the stationery office, at the solicitation, and on the representation of his father that he was of full age. After this business, sir John resigned his seat in parliament for the city, and was called upon to resign his gown as alderman of Langbourne ward, which he declined to comply with.

DEATH OF WILLIAM WILBERFORCE.—This popular religious writer, philanthropist, and parliamentarian, terminated a long public life, in the 74th year of his age, at Cadogan-place, Chelsea. He descended from an old and opulent mercantile family of Hull, in Yorkshire, of which town his grandfather was twice mayor. It was for this borough Mr. Wilberforce was first returned to parliament, and for which he sat till chosen in 1784 for Yorkshire, a county he represented up to 1812, when he exchanged its laborious duties for the less irksome ones of Bamber, and finally relinquished all senatorial functions, in 1825, by accepting the Chiltern Hundreds. Humanity and pious enthusiasm were the leading traits in the character of this amiable person. His father dying while he was very young, the care of his education devolved upon his mother, who placed him under the tuition of the rev. Joseph Milner, an evangelical clergyman, from whom he imbibed those doctrinal impressions, which, after a brief flutter of natural but harmless gaiety, influenced his subsequent life. Constitutionally kind, lively, benevolent and virtuous, Wilberforce had precisely those qualities which calvinistic methodism has no tendency to ameliorate. It was to religion, however, that he chiefly owed his vast influence; and none of his contemporaries, not in official power, exercised greater, both in parliament and the country. His speech against lord Melville is said to have carried along with it forty members; an extraordinary achievement, and quite in contradiction to the common opinion, that the best parliamentary oratory never converts a single vote. He was indeed an effective and very persuasive speaker; mild, yet earnest and pathetic: a diction, pure, copious, elegant, and impressive, was aided by a voice of unequalled power and sweetness. It was not by enlarged and liberal views, nor accuracy and extent of information, that he succeeded, but by the unquestioned sincerity and integrity of his motives. Carried away by the intensity of his convictions, he was frequently unjust to adversaries; was led unconsciously into exaggerations that were untrue, and into unworthy imputations against those whose aims were not less laudable than his own, though sought to be differently realised. There was in this, the intolerant zeal as well as the narrow-minded bigotry that would measure everything by its own standard. His self-denial was great, almost ostentatious; his pleasure was in bestowing rather than in receiving; he might have accumulated riches, honours, and offices on himself, but preferred dispensing them to others. He was vain, fond of power; but, like Madame Maintenon with Louis XIV., loved to pull the wires softly and unseen. It was no mean ambition to seek to lead the great county of York; to be at the head of the religious world; the confidant of the inner cabinet of Pitt, Dundas, Jenkinson, and Scott, in the most eventful times of our history, and, on trying and critical emergencies, to turn the balance of legislative wisdom. Mr. Wilberforce did not surrender this flattering prominence without regret, and which he had made great sacrifices of purse and person to maintain, in keeping open house for politicians—holding levees for all applicants—submitting to have his moral sensibilities wounded by the profane and licentious—loitering at the saloons of the great and fashionable—laborious and costly elections and canvassings—tedious waitings at the Treasury and at Lambeth, for livings, contracts, and appointments, for his constituents—and, lastly, keeping up with everybody and everywhere that eternal “chatteration,” which he considered the great vice of godly people. In retiring from the representation of Yorkshire, he observes, “I cannot deny that I feel very deeply the loss of my high situation and being out of the dramatis personae, whilst all my friends are acting their parts.”—(Life by his Sons, iii, 536.) Mr. Wilberforce was not a party man, though he generally voted on one side; which arose (probably from the principle he held), that we ought generally to incline to the support of men in power, and which might have led him to give his aid to the whigs, as uniformly as he did to the tories, had they been in authority. He was opposed to the commencement of the war of 1793, but by a stratagem of Mr. Pitt—for he appears, on this and other occasions, to have been the half-willing dupe of political jockeyship—he was kept from a public declaration of his sentiments; and, after 1797, he was favourable to the continuance of hostilities, as necessary to national security. In person, which was meagre and diminutive, he had a strong resemblance to the portraits given of Voltaire; and, though the very opposite of the infidel philosopher's sentiment, he had much of his subtle wit, quick perception of the ludicrous, sagacity, and satirical pleasantry. He foresaw clearly that catholic emancipation would not satisfy the Irish; that the still greater grievances of heretic teachers, and the usurpation of the honours and emoluments of the catholic church, would remain.—(Ibid. iii. 362.) "There is nothing," says he, "too foolish for men to believe." "Consult the topic 'Aristocracy,' and you will find all great men hate public meetings." "The good are not so good as they seem;" and the vicious, he might have added, are not without some redeeming virtues. "The first manifest effect of party is that half the talents, not to say all the talents of the country, are employed in thwarting and opposing, instead of promoting, public measures."—(Vol. ii. 456.) "Parties divide on law and arithmetic as well as politics."—(Ibid.) Against too much brevity in popular writing, he said "Do not curtail too much; portable soup must be diluted before it can be used." The great work of the abolition of the African slave-trade—which the example of Granville Sharpe and the indefatigable Thomas Clarkson set him upon, and Stephens and Macauley aided him in carrying forward, constitutes his most enduring monument; and he pursued it with a singleness of purpose that admitted only glancing views at nearer and not less flagrant injustice. There was, indeed, a loftiness in the aspirations of Wilberforce, that delighted to concentrate its gaze on the remote and elevated points of the circle of humanity. His "Practical View of Christianity" referred chiefly to the higher and middle classes, among whom theological tenets are generally more acceptable than the practical precepts of the gospel. He did not, like Howard, "gauge the miseries of jails," and was too regardless of the enormous social evils arising from indigence and popular ignorance. As a lawgiver he was neither gifted nor well-placed. The business of modern legislation refers to the present life, but Mr. Wilberforce viewed everything in relation to the future; which would have been more appropriate in a convocation of divines than among the worldlings of the house of commons. Through an unfortunate farming speculation of one of his sons he suffered, at an advanced age, a great loss of property. Those painful doubts, too, almost inseparable from his peculiar faith, and which nothing save his constitutional vivacity could have enabled him to sustain, weighed heavy upon him in his latter moments. "I am," says he, "in a very distressed state."—"Yes," was the reply, "but you have your feet on the rock," to which he rejoined, "I do not venture to speak so positively, but I hope I have."—(Life by his Sons, v. 373.) A career of virtue, like that of William Wilberforce, ought to have won for him a more firm and tranquil assurance. His life had been spent in doing good. Out of an income of 8000*l.* a-year, he disbursed upwards of 2000*l.* in acts of charity and beneficence. It shows how highly he was esteemed by his Yorkshire constituents, who subscribed 64,445*l.* to defray his expenses in the great election struggle for the county between Milton and Lascelles, in 1809.

Aug. 1. Mr. R. Grant's bill for the removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews lost in the lords by a majority of 104 to 54.

3. The remains of the late Mr. Wilberforce interred in Westminster Abbey, at the request of the most distinguished members of both houses of parliament; 30 peers and 130 commoners attended the funeral of the deceased.

9. Part of the Dublin custom-house warehouses destroyed by fire, with property to the amount of 400,000*l.*

15. Donna Maria acknowledged queen of Portugal at Lisbon, by the government, through Lord William Bentinck, who at the same time presented his credentials as English minister. France, Sweden, and Spain also acknowledged the young queen.

29. CLOSE OF THE FIRST REFORM SESSION.—The king came in person to pro-rogue parliament. The session had been unusually protracted and laborious. The house of commons had sat 142 days, or 1270 hours. The average number of hours each day used to be four and a half or five hours; but during the whole of this session the house had been occupied on an average nine hours daily, and, since Easter, very considerably more than 12 hours. The subjects legislated upon were of great national importance, referring to the state of Ireland, the renewal of the charters of the Bank of England and East India Company, and the abolition of colonial slavery. Of the statutes on these matters that received the royal assent, it will be suitable to give an outline.

Church and Tithes of Ireland.—The chief statute on these subjects is the 3 and 4 Wm. 4. c. 37, relative to the temporalities of the Irish church. By it the number of bishops is reduced from twenty-two to twelve, by the union of sees, as the present incumbents die off. After the death of the present incumbents, also, the income of the archbishopric of Armagh is to be reduced from its present amount of 14,500*l.*, to 10,000*l.*, and that of all the other sees which may be worth more than 4000*l.* a year, to that sum, with the exception of the bishopric of Derry, the value of which is at present about 12,000*l.*, and which is to be reduced immediately to 8000*l.*, and eventually to 6000*l.* The leases of the bishops' lands are to be converted into perpetuities, by which it is supposed that a sum of about 1,000,000*l.* sterling (it was originally calculated at three times that amount) will be realized. The exaction of vestry-cess is abolished. So is also that of first-fruits; in the stead of which there is to be imposed upon all livings above the actual yearly value of 300*l.* an annual tax, varying in its rate according to the value of the living. The money arising from these different sources is to be paid to a board of commissioners, and is, under their direction, to be applied to the augmentation of small benefices, the meeting of those expenses hitherto defrayed by the church-rates, and other purely ecclesiastical objects. The board is also to have the power of suspending the appointment of ministers to parishes in the gift of the king, or of any ecclesiastical corporation, in which no service has been performed for the space of three years. Another act, the 3 and 4 Wm. 4. c. 100, empowers the government to make advances, to the amount of one million, to such of the clergy as had not been able to recover the tithes due to them, to be repaid by five annual instalments. Such of the clergy as accept this aid are to give up their claim to all unpaid tithes for 1830 and preceding years; and also to submit to a deduction of 25 per cent. on those of 1831 and 1832, and of 15 per cent. on those of 1833. By an act passed the preceding session, 2 and 3 Wm. 4. c. 119, it had already been enacted that, after the 1st of November, 1833, the tenants of land should no longer be liable to the payment of tithes, but that that burden should, in all cases, fall upon the landlord. Proceeding upon the principle of this salutary change, the present act provides for the repayment of the advance to be now made to the clergy, by extending the liability of the landlords back to the year 1831, inclusive, and making them the parties from whom the five instalments are to be demanded. Of course they have, in turn, their remedy against the occupiers of the soil. The effect of these arrangements is to place the clergy, in respect of their incomes, altogether out of the way of collision with the mass of the population. The church may still be objectionable, as not being national, or as being kept up at too great an expense for the good it does, but it has ceased to be a catholic grievance, and the burden of its maintenance is thrown almost entirely on the protestant landlords. Acts were also passed for the reform of grand and petty juries, the former exercising far greater powers in Ireland than in England, and more analogous to those of a provincial parliament. The provisions of the Irish Coercion Act have been already stated, Feb. 15.

With less noise and discussion than had accompanied the passing of the Irish bills, Scotland benefited largely by the legislative toils of the year. Without the preliminary of a commission to inquire into abuses that had long been notorious, the lord advocate, seconded by the lord chancellor in the upper house, brought in and carried two bills to reform the election of magistrates and councils in the royal and parliamentary burghs of Scotland. The reform of these corporations had been loudly demanded by the public voice for nearly half a century. Delegates had been appointed so early as 1787, to proceed to London, to manage an application to parliament, and a committee of the commons made a report on the subject in 1793. The war broke out, reform of every description was dropped, and the public heard nothing further on the Scotch burghs till lord Archibald Hamilton, May 6. 1819, moved for a committee of inquiry, which was carried despite of Mr. Canning, who opposed the motion on the ground that a reform of the burghs would be a reform of parliament. Nothing, however, was done, except imposing some restrictions on the powers hitherto exercised by the magistrates in the expenditure of the burgh funds; but not touching the existing system in other respects. This was reserved for the reformed parliament, and the passing of the two bills, and of a third statute for the improvement of the police of the burghs, has almost perfected the municipal government of Scotland.

One of the most generous acts of legislation ever recorded, perhaps, of any assembly is that for the Abolition of Colonial Slavery. The African slave-trade had been abolished in 1807; but the act of the present session abolished slavery itself in the West Indies. All children under six years of age, or born after Aug. 1, 1834, are declared free; all registered slaves above six years become, from the same date, apprenticed labourers, divided into two principal classes, prædial, or those employed in agriculture, and the non-prædial; the apprenticeships of the former to expire Aug. 1, 1838, of the latter, Aug. 1, 1840. The hours of labour of the prædial apprentice not to exceed forty-five in any one week, and for which they are to be paid either by being boarded and lodged, or by receiving a sum in money weekly. By the transition into the apprentice state, the slave immediately entered into the chief immunities of a freeman; he could not be arbitrarily punished by his master, and became eligible to give evidence in criminal and civil courts, to serve on juries, and in the militia. One of the chief difficulties to settle was in determining the compensation to be given to the owners of slaves for the loss of their compulsory services. A very small party in the commons was in favour of the immediate and entire emancipation of the negroes, and that without any compensation whatever: ministers at first proposed advancing a loan of fifteen millions to the West India proprietors; subsequently this loan was transmuted into a gift of 20,000,000*l.*, by which liberal donation, Mr. Secretary Stanley said, the whole plan would ensure the cordial co-operation of the planters and colonial legislatures. On this basis it was settled, and an end put to a question which had formed almost the exclusive subject of public interest and agitation by the religious portion of the community during the last half-century.

The Government of Hindostan formed a more important subject of legislation than the preceding, affecting a population of 100 millions, whereas the slavery bill applied only to 800,000 blacks. But the welfare of the Hindoos excited much less interest both among members of Parliament and their constituents, and may be partly ascribed to the West India question involving a great moral principle, while the state of our Oriental empire was either a legislative subject of which few were competent to form an opinion, or interesting only to a limited class of commercialists, whom ministers had conciliated by at once conceding a free trade to China, and the other points for which they had petitioned and agitated. The new legislation for India was comprised in three statutes, numbered chapters 85, 93, and 101 of the session: the first applied to the renewal of the charter of the East India Company, and the future government of India; the second regulates the trade to China and India; and the third refers to the collection and management of the duties on tea. The charter of the Company is renewed for the term of twenty years, from April 30, 1834, under certain restrictions:—1. The Chinese trade is thrown open; 2. That on the company transferring to the crown all their effects and claims, the latter is to take upon itself the Company's obligations, and to pay them a certain sum annually from the Indian revenue; and 3. The political government of India is continued to the Company for twenty years, the Company abandoning their commercial pursuits. These were the outlines of the new Indian administration. Subordinate provisions were made for the landing, residence, and settlement of British subjects in India; for the creation of two new bishopricks in India, in addition to that of Calcutta; for the mitigation and gradual abolition of slavery in the East; and for the appointment of a law commission to inquire into and improve the existing laws, police, and courts of justice of Hindostan.

Charter of the Bank of England.—There was an elaborate inquiry in the session of 1832, by a parliamentary committee, of which Lord Althorp was chairman, into the expediency of renewing the charter of the Bank, and, in the course of the present session, there were protracted discussions both on the bank charter and the general state of the currency. The three questions on which the legislature were divided were, first, as to the expediency of continuing the exclusive privileges of the Bank, and maintaining it in the position it had long held, of being the principal and governing monetary association of the empire; to this policy ministers were favourable, and, also, as it appeared, a large majority of the parliament. There were, however, two classes of economists, one of whom advocated the scheme of a national bank, to be managed by the government, and its profits accrue to the public; while another was against any monopoly, and would have had the trade of issuing notes left perfectly free, like any other branch of private business. There was, also, a fourth party, but their notions were not restricted to banking—they extended to the general state of the currency, and aimed at its depreciation by a copious issue of paper, in order to counteract the alleged effect of Peel's bill. To the expedient of altering the standard of value there was a salutary repugnance, and government succeeded in defeating this and other suggestions in opposition to their own propositions for the renewal of the Bank charter. The Bank, however, was deprived of two of its privileges: first, the restriction which prohibited other banks from drawing bills on London for less than 50*l.* is abolished; and banks beyond the distance of 65 miles may now issue notes, and make them payable in London, for any sum not under 5*l.* Secondly, banks of deposit may now be established in London, or within 65 miles of it, having more than six partners: in truth, the bank had never any privilege in this respect, and it was a popular error to suppose that banking firms of more than six could not legally exist in the metropolis prior to the act of 1833. Another concession obtained from the Bank is a reduction, to the amount of 120,000*l.*, in a charge of about 280,000*l.* the directors annually made for the management of the public debt, &c. Further, the Bank is required to publish monthly, in the London Gazette, a statement of its assets, and amount of notes in circulation. A like obligation of making periodical returns of their issues of notes was imposed, during the session, on the country banks. The Bank obtained one important privilege, its paper is made a legal tender for all sums above 5*l.*, except by the Bank itself, or its branches; so that a bank-note is made equivalent to gold if offered in acquittance of a debt or other obligation exceeding 5*l.* This clause parliament left open to be rescinded, if it thought fit, before the termination of the new charter. There is another enactment of general interest, namely, that by which bills of exchange drawn for not exceeding three months are exempt from the usury laws. The charter is renewed under these limitations till August, 1855, with this reservation, however, that it might be put an end to, should parliament choose, in 1845, by a year's previous notice being given.

In addition to these great legislative measures, elaborately discussed and settled, various taxes were repealed, the public estimates reduced, and financial and judicial amendments adopted. The following is a title of the subordinate matters effected during the session:—

- Total repeal of the duty on tiles.
- Repeal of 2*s.* stamp-duty on advertisements.
- Reduction of duty on marine insurances.
- Reduction of assessed taxes on shops, &c.
- Repeal of stamp-duty on receipts under 5*l.*
- Repeal of additional duty (2821) on raw cotton.
- Reduction of half the duty on soap.
- Protection of dramatic copyrights.
- Improvement of London police act.
- General watching and lighting act for England.
- Limitation of actions relative to real property.
- Improving judicial administration.
- Offices abolished and reformed in the Court of Chancery.
- Copyhold estates made assets for payment of simple contract equally with specialty debts.
- Laws of dower and inheritance amended.
- Punishment of death abolished for burglary.
- Fines and recoveries abolished.

Laws amended relative to sewers, factories, insane persons, high roads in Scotland, and sale of beer in Ireland, &c.

About 165 private bills were introduced, discussed, passed, and received the royal assent. An account appeared of the number of times each member of the commons spoke during this memorable working session, and how many columns in the "Mirror of Parliament" his speeches occupied. Upwards of 11,000 speeches were delivered, and the six most frequent speakers were:—

Aug. 30. A great fire at Constantinople; by which one-fourth of the city is destroyed. It is attributed to incendiaries and the result of public discontent.

31. The ship Amphitrite, conveying convicts to New South Wales, and having on board 103 female convicts, 12 children, and a crew of 16 men, was driven on the Boulogne sands, in the heavy gale which commenced on the 29th. Those on board might, probably, have been saved before the return of the tide, but, apparently through the captain's doubt as to his authority to allow the convicts to escape to the shore, as well as through the sanitary regulations of the French, all, except three of the crew, were drowned.

A regular daily mail, Sunday excepted, established between England and France.

Sept. 7. Died, aged 88, Mrs. HANNAH MORE. This distinguished lady was one of five daughters of the schoolmaster of a charity-school, and afterwards of a private school, at Bristol. Mrs. More's moral and religious works are very numerous, and established for her a very considerable literary reputation; while the circumstance that she had numbered Garrick, Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, and Wilberforce, among her friends and correspondents, attached a powerful interest to her person. It was at one time contemplated to intrust her with the education of the Princess Charlotte; but, as she would not accept a limited control, the design was abandoned. She is said to have realized 30,000*l.* by her writings; and, by her will, 10,000*l.* is distributed among various religious and charitable institutions.

11. At this date 20,000 persons had perished from cholera since the 5th of August.

22. The young Queen of Portugal arrived at Lisbon, and was well received by the inhabitants.

24. The Corporation of Leicester refused to deliver up to his Majesty's commissioners, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of Municipal Corporations, certain documents and accounts required by them, as well as to submit to a personal and public examination before them. The corporations of Norwich, Maidstone, and the Merchant Tailors' Company of London, subsequently followed the example.

29. DEATH OF FERDINAND VII.—The King of Spain was in his fiftieth year, and his demise, which was reported to have taken place almost a twelvemonth before, was an event that had long been expected. His life had been one of painful vicissitudes, and of more trouble than experienced by many of his subjects. Ever since the embroilment with his father in 1808, which afforded a pretext for the interference of Napoleon in Spanish affairs, his name had been conspicuous in Europe, but mostly associated with acts of weakness and tyranny. His death became the signal for the breaking out of fresh political dissensions, the origin of which it will be proper to explain. Ferdinand was four times married; by his first three wives he had no surviving issue, but by his fourth and last wife, Maria Christina, daughter of Francis I. King of the Two Sicilies, whom he had espoused Dec. 11, 1829, he left two daughters, the eldest, Isabella, born Oct. 10, 1830; and the younger born Jan. 30, 1832. The king, fond of his young spouse, naturally wished to secure the royal succession to their progeny, and there was nothing in the ancient or existing laws of Spain to frustrate his desire. The crown of Spain had followed the example of almost every other European country except France, and descended to the next inheritor, whether male or female, either by right of primogeniture, or the testamentary grant of the reigning sovereign. It was only in 1714 that Philip V. violated the established usage, by adopting the Salic law of the French, which excludes females from the throne, and abrogated the ancient law of succession in the Spanish monarchy. The act was considered despotic, and in the absence of female claimants was practically inoperative. Philip V. was succeeded in 1746 by his son Ferdinand VI., who, dying in 1759, left the throne to his brother Charles III. The latter in 1788 was succeeded by his son Charles IV. the father of Ferdinand VII. But, though inoperative, the law of Philip V. was in force till repealed. This had been done some time previously to the late king's death. In 1830, before the birth of his daughter, Ferdinand by a royal ordinance formally restored the ancient law of succession, which permitted females to inherit the throne. The Salic law was thus abolished by an authority equal to that by which it had been introduced. Still further to fortify the right of his daughter, Ferdinand exercised in her behalf another prerogative, and named her his successor in his will; and by the same instrument he appointed the queen regent till the infant Isabella attained the age of eighteen years. Notwithstanding this two-fold settlement, Ferdinand's brother, Charles Maria Isidore, commonly called Don Carlos, claimed the throne in virtue of the Salic law, which had been repealed, had only temporally existed in Spain, and was never practically in force. The conflicting claims of the uncle and niece are nationally important, chiefly as involving the triumph of one or the other of the two political parties into which Spain is divided. The rights of Isabella II. are supported by the liberals, the pretensions of Don Carlos by the absolutists. Before the king's death the queen manifested a favourable disposition towards the constitutionalists; it was manifest that, guided by the councils of M. Zea, the chief minister, she depended upon their support for securing the succession to her infant daughter. Ferdinand was no sooner dead than the Carlists were in motion, headed by monks, monopolists, and a few conservative grandees. Their strength lies chiefly in Navarre, Catalonia, and the Biscayan provinces; they have also adherents in Old Castile, and Estremadura. The chief strength of the constitutionalists is in Madrid, and in the provinces of Andalusia, Murcia, Valencia, and other districts bordering the Mediterranean. The queen regent was not slow in adopting vigorous and popular measures to counteract the Carlists. With the aid of the provincial militia and volunteers, she disbanded in October, after some resistance and bloodshed, the royalist volunteers of the capital, and in Toledo. In the same month decrees were issued attacking the pervading system of privileges and monopolies; and commissions were appointed to remodel the laws respecting the post-office, the censorship of the press, and public education. At the same time a prudence was observed in not unnecessarily disturbing existing interests and prejudices, and the error in which the Spanish patriots had formerly lost themselves, by playing at the game of constitution-making, was especially shunned. Towards the end of the year, General Saarsfield had succeeded in driving the Carlist bands into their fastnesses, and the civil war appeared nearly at an end. Unfortunately the successes of the Queenites were accompanied with the exercise of great cruelties on their opponents, which was both criminal and impolitic.

Oct. 25. Numerous meetings held about this time to pass resolutions against the payment of the assessed taxes. This day the populace rescued the property of Mr. Savage of Marylebone, which had been seized for arrears of taxes.

26. Harmer and Wilson, sheriffs, proceeded in person to make a levy on the goods of householders who had refused to pay the assessed taxes. It was only requisite to enforce the seizure in the case of one person, the others either paying the demand or allowing others to pay for them.

Nov. 4. The missionaries of a new French sect called St. Simonians appear in London. They inveigh against the corruption, chicanery, and slavery of society, but do not propound any intelligible scheme by which they can be obviated. They profess to seek or worship a mystical personage, designated the "Mother," whom they describe to be "the first woman of superior intelligence, who shall perceive the path which reason points out, and possesses sufficient moral courage to act upon the principle she has discovered." They wear a tunic coat, the neck uncovered, and a red waistcoat.

18. Sir John Herschel embarks for the Cape of Good Hope, for the purpose of making observations on the stars of the southern hemisphere.

19. Instructions issued from the Colonial Office, describing the measures necessary to be taken by the local authorities in the West Indies, in carrying into effect the Slavery Abolition Bill.

28. On a criminal trial in the Old Bailey, two witnesses appeared who refused to be sworn in the usual way, avowing themselves atheists. Counsel refused to interrogate them, and they withdrew from the court amidst strong expressions of disgust.

Numerous incendiary fires of barns and agricultural produce, in this and the preceding months. The counties in which these outrages chiefly occurred, were Norfolk, Suffolk, Northampton, Wiltshire, and Hampshire.

Dec. 2. Trial in the court of king's bench of W. J. Bankes, M.P., and a soldier, for sodomy. The Jury brought in a verdict of not guilty, and the foreman declared that the defendants would leave the court without a stain upon their characters.

2. The Anatomy Schools at Cambridge fired by the mob, the windows broken, and some of the skeletons and preparations destroyed, in consequence of the discovery that the body of a pauper, instead of being interred, had been removed to the schools.

7. John Statian, a noted incendiary, executed in front of Cambridge gaol. By a confession which he made, it appears that he destroyed eleven extensive barns successively, by the following plan: he rolled some combustible matter in a quantity of linen, which, at a favourable opportunity, he inserted in the stack. The property which he had been the means of destroying is calculated at the value of 60,000*l.*, and his sole motive was the paltry consideration of 6*s.* 6*d.*, which he was accustomed to receive for giving notice to the fire-office of the commencement of the calamity.

23. After several days' hearing, an important case, as affects religious trusts, was decided in the Vice-Chancellor's Court. The object of it was to take out of the hands of the trustees, members of a Unitarian chapel, certain funds known by the name of Isaac Sarah Hewley's Charity, and left for the purpose of inculcating Trinitarian doctrines. The Vice was of opinion that the defendants, holding Unitarian opinions, were not objects of Lady Hewley's charity: and the Court, therefore, could not allow the charity any longer to be administered by trustees who denied the divinity of Christ and the doctrine of original sin.

23. The French Chambers opened by the King in person. The royal speech gave a flattering description of the state of France, both at home and abroad.

MISCELLANIES.—The present year, which has been unusually stormy, proved very disastrous to the shipping interest. The maritime losses recorded to the 15th inst. amounted to 20,000 tons of shipping.

Mr. Schmaltz of Dresden has published a table of the number of deaf and dumb persons dispersed over the leading countries of Europe in the year 1830. It shows that in all the proportion is nearly the same, namely, one deaf and dumb in every 1539 of the general mass of the population.

It is computed that there are 13,000 blind persons in England and Wales.

It appears from the reports of the Commissioners of Excise Inquiry, that the number of auctioneers in England is 3040; Scotland, 378; Ireland, 278: total, 3686.

As a means of moral and architectural improvement in London, Mr. Smirke has offered some useful suggestions. He proposes to open handsome streets through St. Giles's and other central parts of the metropolis, now chiefly the resort of vice and wretchedness, and locate their inhabitants in more commodious and economical dwellings erected on the unoccupied wastes and ground-plots in the environs of the capital.

STATISTICS OF POLAND.—According to returns made in 1833, the kingdom of Poland contains 453 towns, of which 212½ belong to the Crown, and 240½ are private property; 22,545 villages, of which 5296 belong to the Crown, and 17,249 are private property. The kingdom is divided into 2081 parishes and 5607 communes, which contain 483,176 houses, of which 401,257 are in the country and 83,919 in the towns. The male population amounts to 1,933,390; the female population to 1,981,275: total, 3,914,665. The population of the towns is 835,875; the rural population, 3,075,790. The number of Roman Catholics is 3,237,448; belonging to the Greek church, 106,936; Lutherans, 177,800; Reformed Calvinists, 3815; Jews, 333,102; Mahometans, &c., 5558.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—On his return from South America, Captain Lyon, the traveller; he commanded two of the expeditions sent out to explore the Arctic Regions. William Bray, 97, antiquary, and editor of the "Memoirs of Evelyn." General Sir Banastre Tarleton, 78, an officer distinguished in the American war of independence, and twenty-two years M.P. for Liverpool. At Southampton, O'Keefe, 86, a popular dramatist. At St. Albans, Sir William Donville, 91, formerly a bookseller, and lord mayor on the occasion of the grand entertainment given in 1813 in Guildhall to the allied sovereigns. Earl Fitzwilliam, 86, a popular and patriotic Yorkshire nobleman of Whig principles. J. I. Smith, 67, keeper of the prints in the British Museum, and author of several works on the antiquities of London. Sir Christopher Robinson, 67, judge of the High Court of Admiralty. Dr. Babington, 76, father of the London physicians, and agreeable associate of the chief philosophers of the last half-century, from Priestley to Davy: a subscription amounting to 1300*l.* was raised for the erection of a monument to his memory in St. Paul's cathedral. Admiral Sir H. Blackwood, late commander at the Nile and groom of the bedchamber to the King. William Morgan, 56 years actuary to the Equitable Assurance Company, during which he had seen the rise of that association from a capital of a few thousands to one of several millions. At Paris, of an inveterate cancer in the throat, Savary, Duke of Rovigo, a faithful but servile instrument of Napoleon's despotism: since the accession of the Orleans family the Duke had been recalled from obscurity and made governor of Algiers. Agar Ellis, Lord

Dover, 36, a literary nobleman and patron of the arts, who was also the author of several historical works, and of some able articles both in the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews. George Granville Leveson Gower, first Duke of Sutherland, 75½ for many years he was a Pittite, but voted in favour of the Reform Bill: he was a magnificent patron of the arts, which he was well enabled to be by his vast income of 300,000*l.* per annum, formed by the union of the Stafford, Bridgewater, and Sutherland possessions. Godfrey Higgins, 62, a magistrate of Yorkshire, of a strong and original mind, who was the author of Horæ Sabbaticæ, in which he endeavoured to show that the Christian Sunday was a human and secular institution for the purpose of festivity, not worship. At Chelsea, of cholera, H. H. Haworth, an eminent botanist and entomologist. John Gordon Smith, M. D., 41, professor of medical jurisprudence in the London University, and author of some valuable works on that important subject. At Stapleton Park, near Bristol, Rajah Rammohun Roy, a learned Hindoo of the Brahminical caste, who sought to reform the idolatrous worship of his countrymen: he had resided three years in England, partly on a mission connected with the renewal of the charter of the East India Company, and evinced much curiosity respecting Christianity, but died in the Hindoo faith. Richard Heber, 60, formerly M. P. for Oxford, and celebrated bibliomaniac, which pursuit he enthusiastically followed with the advantages of celibacy and a large fortune. Mr. Heber's accumulation of books was immense: his houses in London, at Paris, Brussels, Antwerp, and Ghent, were converted into vast depôts of literary stores. Notwithstanding all these pains, and occasionally of energy, Heber's life realized no object save that of merely collecting, and he died deserted by society, in seclusion, melancholy, and self-abandonment. He was passionately fond of letters, without becoming an author; a devoted admirer of parliamentary oratory, without once venturing, in the house of commons, to become a speaker. His will, after a long search, was found on a bookshelf, where it had been apparently carelessly thrown, and his vast collection of books, many of them in parcels that had never been opened, was dispersed by public auction. At Lewes, John Ellman, 78, a practical agriculturist of nearly sixty years' experience, who contributed to improve the breed of Southdown sheep. In London, of apoplexy, Andrew Picken, 45, a Scotchman, who, after sustaining serious commercial reverses, produced several novels, tales, and compilations of considerable merit and originality. At Paris, Marshal Jourdan, 71, almost the last representative of the military glories of the republic. Jourdan was among the first who discovered the ambitious views of Buonaparte, which lost him the confidence along with the favourable opinion of that dazzling adventurer: "Jourdan is a poor general," said Napoleon at St. Helena, "but he possessed the virtues rare among his competitors of honour, integrity, and humanity." At Calais, General Edward Stacken, after a changeful and adventurous career. He was an Irish Catholic, and in his youth was one of the aides-de-camp of Louis XV.; went to America with Lafayette; was on board Paul Jones's ship Le Bon Homme Richard, when she took the Seraphis; served in the East Indies under the Marquis de Bouillé; was at Coblenz with the emigrant French princes; was one of Napoleon's détenus on the rupture of the peace of Amiens; was a fellow-prisoner of the Duke d'Enghien, and died at a very advanced age a major-general in the British service. Henry George Herbert, second Earl of Carnarvon, 60, though his lordship started in political life as the friend of Mr. Fox, and was strongly attached to the Whig party, he gave a determined opposition to the Reform Bill. The neglect he experienced on the formation of the Grey ministry, and which arose from his bodily infirmities, was the imputed cause of this dereliction. William Sotheby, 77, the distinguished translator of Homer and of Wieland's Oberon.

A.D. 1834. TRADES' UNIONS.—In addition to ministerial changes, both in England and France, the final expulsion of Don Miguel from Portugal, and the passing of the poor law amendment act, the occurrences of the present year are diversified with the proceedings of the trade societies. These unions of operatives were not less active at Paris, Lyons, and Brussels, than in London, Dublin, Manchester, and Leeds. As workmen can only form effective combinations against their employers when their services are in urgent request, the existence of the numerous associations to keep up the price of labour are evidence of the industrial activity now pervading Europe. Up to the year 1824 the law of England made it a crime for workmen to combine, even in the most peaceable manner, for the purpose of obtaining a rise, or preventing a fall, of their wages. But in that year parliament abolished this invidious restriction, and workmen were allowed the same liberty in fixing the price of their labour that capitalists exercised in fixing the prices of their commodities. The old law was inefficient as well as inequitable. It did not, in fact, prevent the alliance it prohibited. Trades unions were formed and maintained in the face of it. They existed in the metropolis and all the chief towns; and its chief tendency was to render proceedings, that would have been open, secret and stealthy. Besides keeping up the price of labour by the only just mode of sustaining its value, that of refusing to sell it, the unionists adopted regulations that infringed the liberty to others they sought to exercise themselves. The number of apprentices to be taken by masters and the time of their servitude was to be regulated by the union; the employment of any but regularly associated workmen was, if possible, to be prevented. They even claimed to regulate wages by the rate of profit derived from capital and from mechanical improvements. It is impossible to say how far these interferences with the liberty of others would have proceeded had they met no resistance, or not been defeated by their own inherent unreasonableness. In the course of the present year it will be seen that there was a succession of "strikes" among the most numerous and useful classes of workpeople both in London and the country. Consumers of products of all kinds, and of all ranks and degrees, appeared in danger of being reduced to their natural resources. The gasmen in London would not afford light; the tailors, shoemakers, builders, and shipwrights refused their aid; and the weavers and spinners of Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Glasgow, in quick succession, became refractory. But the different crafts were all reduced to submission, either by the superior tact or greater means of their employers. Masters were determined to be masters, and having, in some instances, a show of reason on their side, their efforts at resistance were seconded by the public press, the magistrates, and the government. At Dorchester assizes advantage was taken of some statutes, little known or understood, to convict, and sentence to transportation, for belonging to illegal societies, and administering illegal oaths, six agricultural labourers. This conviction, which was unexpected, and thought to be severe, if not unjust, produced strenuous efforts to obtain a remission of punishment.

Jan. 1. During the last three months the storms have been almost perpetual, and the loss of shipping and human life unexampled. At Boulogne, 300 children have lost their fathers since the commencement of the herring season.

2. Died, aged 49, the Hon. G. Lamb, brother of Lord Melbourne, and author of an elegant translation of Catullus. In 1814, Mr. Lamb was put forward by the whigs, to contest the representation of Westminster, against the radicals, who had started Mr. Hobhouse. The contest lasted fifteen days, and terminated in favour of the whig candidate.

19. Death of Lord Grenville, at Drogheda, on the 74th year of his age. He was third son of William Grenville, prime minister from 1763 to 1765. Mr. Grenville was private secretary to his brother, earl Temple, lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1782; succeeded Mr. Burke as paymaster of the army in 1783; became speaker of the House of Commons in 1789; received a patent of peerage in 1790; and, thenceforward, became the representative, both in style and sentiment, of his relative, premier Pitt, in the upper house. In the following year he exchanged the seals of the home for the foreign department; the latter he retained till the resignation of Mr. Pitt in 1801. He was a statesman of considerable natural abilities, possessed of a sound judgment, correct memory, and an eloquence chaste, masculine, and commanding. He had studied the principles of political economy, the importance of which he appreciated; was versed in modern languages, international law, and the detail of European politics, could endure fatigue, and, like Mr. Pitt, had hardly any pursuit apart from his official duties. Business was not merely his ambition but amusement. Lord Grenville shared with Mr. Pitt in the intimations held out to the Catholics to facilitate the Irish union, and was more consistent and firm than his colleague in his efforts to redeem their joint engagements. During the thirteen months' administration of "All the Talents," in 1806-7, he rendered himself very unpopular by holding, with the office of first lord of the treasury, the profitable sinecure of auditor of the exchequer, which had been conferred upon him in 1795, and which he held till his death. His haughty diplomacy in 1793 hastened and exasperated the commencement of hostilities, in the pertinacious countenance of which he was foremost among the war-party. He supported the renewal of the war for the deposition of Napoleon in 1815; from which period he seldom took part in parliamentary discussion, except on the catholic question, when he steadily seconded the efforts of lords Grey, Lansdowne, and Holland, for emancipation. His lordship furnished some valuable annotations to an edition of Homer, privately printed, and was the author of several pamphlets; in one of which, published shortly before his death, he admitted the fallacious principle on which Mr. Pitt's sinking fund had been established.

16. A change of ministry took place in Spain, and M. Zea Bermudez was replaced as prime minister by Martinez de la Rosa; a literary character, and more decided liberal. This change was made by the queen-regent at the earnest request of the captain-general of Catalonia and Old Castile, Llander and Quesada.

20. At an interview between the deputation of the Nottingham meeting of Dissenters and earl Grey, his lordship declared the 'disposition of himself' and colleagues to relieve the dissenters from the disabilities connected with marriage, burial, and registration; but that he would give his strenuous opposition to every attempt to remove the establishment, considering it the duty of every government to maintain an establishment of religion.

25. Lord Althorp declined to receive the Westminster deputation for the repeal of the assessed taxes, having already received deputations on the subject from every part of the metropolis; and he said ministers had already determined on their course in regard to these taxes.

29. Duke of Wellington unanimously elected chancellor of the university of Oxford, in the room of the late Lord Grenville. The ceremony of installation took place at Apsley House.

31. Baron Bayley retired from the bench at an advanced age. He had successively sat in the courts of common pleas, king's bench, and the exchequer. Sir W. Horne was first appointed to the vacancy, and resigned the office of attorney-general to fill it; but, changing his mind, Mr. John Williams succeeded Sir J. Bayley; sir John Campbell became attorney-general, and Mr. Pepys solicitor-general.

Incendiary fires in Dorsetshire; supposed to be the first known in Scotland.

A law at Frankfort, which limited the marriages of Jews in that city to thirteen in the year, repealed.

FOREIGN TREATIES.—In this month a treaty was concluded between Austria, Russia, and Prussia, by which these powers mutually agreed to deliver up, on the demand of the aggrieved state, all persons accused of rebellion or treason, or of being engaged in any plot against the throne or the government. These stipulations were not to have a retrospective operation. (Ann. Reg. lxxvi. 456.) A convention, concluded about the same period between Belgium and France, forms a contrast to the alliance of the despots. By this agreement it is stipulated that fugitives for crimes and offences, not political, shall be reciprocally delivered up by each country.

Feb. 1. Captain Wathen, of the 15th Hussars, charged, at the instance of his Lieut.-Colonel, Lord Brudenell, with insubordination and officer-like conduct, after a trial at Cork, which lasted for 18 days, was honourably acquitted. His Majesty approved the finding of the court-martial, and directed the removal of Lord Brudenell.

2. General Romarino, at the head of 400 Italians and Poles, made an irruption into Savoy for the purpose of effecting a revolution; finding no support, they fell back on Geneva, where they made an unsuccessful attempt to excite insurrection, and were finally disarmed, and ordered to quit Switzerland.

4. Second session of the REFORMED PARLIAMENT opened by the king in person. His majesty congratulated them on the manner in which the bill for the abolition of slavery had been received in the Colonies; called their attention to the reports of the municipal corporations, ecclesiastical, and poor law commissions; and expressed his satisfaction at the good understanding which prevailed between the governments of Britain and France; mentioned the recognition of the young queen of Spain; and, in allusion to Turkey, declared that it would be his object to maintain the independence of that empire. He lamented the distress which prevailed among the occupiers of land; recommended the adjustment of tithes in Ireland; and expressed his determination to maintain inviolate the legislative union. The address in the lords was moved by the Duke of Sutherland, and seconded by Lord Howard of Effingham; in the commons by Mr. Shaw Lefevre and Mr. Morrison. They were agreed to in both houses without alteration.

5. Lord Althorp and Mr. Shiel ordered into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms. A report had been circulated, that some of the Irish members had privately declared themselves in favour of the Coercion Bill of last session, though they had voted against it. To the question,—“Who is the traitor?” an answer of Lord Althorp’s implied that Mr. Shiel was one of them. An inquiry by a parliamentary committee showed that his lordship had been misinformed.

13. A strong feeling prevailed in the legislative assembly of Lower Canada against the governor, lord Aylmer, and the secretary for the colonies, Mr. Stanley, on account of their refusal to re-model the legislative council. Articles of impeachment were carried against lord Aylmer. The language of Mr. Stanley was described as “inconsiderate and insulting.”

14. The chancellor of the exchequer made his financial statement, and informed the house that the surplus revenue was 1,500,000*l.*, which, with a reduction of 500,000*l.* on the estimates, and 600,000*l.*, which he expected from an increase in the tea duty, in consequence of the opening of the China trade, would leave a surplus of 2,600,000*l.* This surplus would enable him to remit the house duty, and pay the 800,000*l.* interest on the grant of 20 millions to the West India proprietors, leaving the remainder for future consideration.

The Turkish government has determined on the establishment of a post for the regular conveyance of letters throughout the empire, and as a means of revenue.

Lord TEIGNMOUTH died at the advanced age of 83. His lordship was formerly governor-general of India, and president of the British and Foreign Bible Society, from the period of its institution. As an author, his principal work is a “Life of Sir William Jones,” with whom he was intimately acquainted.

15. Business suspended at Lyons, in consequence of a general strike of the workmen for higher wages.

Many of the public-houses having become mere gin-shops, the home office has issued a paper, directing one of the magistrates at each of the metropolitan police-offices to examine them personally, in order to ascertain whether they have the necessary convenience for a working man to cook his dinner.

17. Died at Bath, aged 68, JOHN THELWALL, the public lecturer, and, during the excitement of the French revolution, popular agitator. He was born in London; was first a student at the Royal Academy, next an attorney’s clerk, afterwards a student of medicine, then some other occupation; but his favourite pursuit was the political debating societies. He was the last survivor of the twelve who were sought to be victimized under a charge of constructive treason, in the state trials of 1794, (see Oct. 29.) Having escaped this danger, Mr. Thelwall tried farming, and at last settled down into a teacher of elocution, unmixt with politics. In this engagement he was successful, and after an itinerant course in the country, fixed his abode in London; taking pupils afflicted with impediments of speech, in the treatment of which he became celebrated. He was himself a striking instance of the success of his own powers in overcoming the imperfections of nature by art. His voice was originally feeble and husky, yet by perseverance he acquired an extraordinary distinctness of articulation, and even in the open air could make himself heard at a great distance.

26. Mr. Richardson, steward to Mr. Perkins, of Bletchingly, was murdered on Epsom Downs. A reward of 300*l.* was offered for the apprehension of the murderer.

March 1. Corporation inquiry in the city of London closed. The city companies remain to be investigated by the commissioners, of which the only announced recusant is the Merchant Tailors.

After two nights' debate, the motion of Mr. Hume for substituting, instead of the present graduated scale of duties, a fixed and moderate duty on import, and a bounty on the export, with the ultimate view of establishing a free trade in corn, was rejected by 312 to 155. The president of the Board of Trade supported the motion; lord Althorp was theoretically in its favour, but did not think any urgent necessity existed for a change in the present system.

8. A general "strike" for higher wages took place among the persons employed by the London gas companies. Some inconvenience for a few nights was felt in consequence, but the masters having been apprised of the strike beforehand, in a short time the places of the men engaged in the combination were filled up by workmen from the country. They required that their wages should be advanced from 28s. a week to 35s., with an allowance besides of two pints of porter each per day.

11. A rencontre took place between some Jersey fishing-boats, which had in the night trespassed within the restricted limits of eight miles off the French coast, and a French armed cutter. One boat was taken, and the master of another shot. The coroner's inquest, held at Jersey, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against those who shot him.

13. Returns were published, from which it appears that the number of floggings in the army had, in the years 1830-31-32-33, been respectively 665, 646, 483, and 370. In the navy the number of corporal punishments were, in 1830, 2,022; 1831, 1,727; 1832, 1,762; 1833, 1,502.

Mr. C. Rippon's motion for the ejection of the bishops from the house of lords was lost, in the commons, by a majority of 125 to 58. It excited no discussion, ministers, without expressing their sentiments, simply voting against it.

14. A return published of the net expenses of the Penitentiary, Millbank, for the last year, from which it appeared that the number of prisoners was 566, and the expense of maintenance little short of 36l. a head.

Major Fancourt's motion for the abolition of military flogging was rejected by a majority of 227 to 94.

15. A numerous meeting of scientific and literary gentlemen and others was held at the rooms of the Horticultural Society, for the purpose of forming a Statistical Society, for the collection and classification of facts relating to the present condition and prospects of mankind, and especially of the British empire. Lord Lansdowne in the chair; the resolutions were supported by Spring Rice, M.P., James Abercrombie, M.P., Professor Jones, and Messrs. Babbage, Hallam, and Drinkwater.

A branch of the Bank of England is about to be opened at Plymouth. This will be the fourteenth establishment in connection with the Bank.

17. At Dorchester assizes, six agricultural labourers convicted of a felony, in being members of an illegal society, and administering illegal oaths. It appeared that the system of many of the trades' unions had been adopted by these persons. The oaths were administered with a good deal of mummery, the persons taking them being blindfolded, and then shown the picture of a skeleton, death's head, &c. The prisoners were sentenced to seven years' transportation. Large meetings were held in London, Birmingham, and other parts of the country, to petition the crown in their favour. The subject was noticed in parliament, April 18, when Lord Howick denied that the convicts were ignorant men, since two of them were methodist preachers; and the documents found upon them showed that government had been enabled to deal with the ringleaders of a body, that, if not checked in its career, would have proceeded to a mischievous extent.

18. 3,000 workmen in the woollen manufacture struck at Leeds, in consequence of the determination of their employers only to employ those who would relinquish the trades' union.

21. A royal proclamation issued, by which an alteration is made in the distribution of naval prize-money; the most important parts of which are, that the flag officers are to have 1-16th, the captains and commanders 1-6th of the remainder, and the rest to be distributed among the subalterns and men, according to a fixed scale.

26. Lord Chancellor introduced a bill for the establishment of a central criminal court in the metropolis (See Aug. 15).

The widow of Burns, the poet, died of paralysis at her house in Dumfries. She was in the 72d year of her age, and had survived her husband 38 years.

27. The chamber of deputies, by a vote of 176 to 168, annulled a treaty concluded in 1831 by the Duke de Broglie and General Sebastiani, and refused to grant about 1,000,000l. which the ministry were pledged to pay to the United States as an indemnity for the injuries inflicted during the last war, by the French, upon American ships and commerce. In consequence Boggio and Sebastiani resigned their places, and the ministry underwent almost a complete reconstruction; but Marshal Soult remained at the head.

29. The editor of the Tribune newspaper condemned to a fine of 24,000 francs (960*l.*), and five years' imprisonment, for a libel on the subject of political associations, and for encouraging the trade unionists of Lyons. The Tribune had been seized by the Government 95 times.

During this month the United States were much agitated by the declared determination of President Jackson to suppress the United States bank, and by the consequent withdrawal of the government deposits from the bank. The failure of 96 banks in the States about this time was attributed to this determination, in which the President was zealously opposed by the senate, and warmly supported by the house of representatives.

April 4. Sir Richard G. Keats, governor of Greenwich Hospital, died in his 84th year, and was succeeded by Sir Thomas Hardy. He was shipmate of the king at the commencement of his naval career; had charge of his instruction, and was with him in the engagement between Rodney and Langara, in 1780.

9. RIOTS IN FRANCE.—Serious riots broke out at Lyons, arising from the attempts of trades' unionists to interfere with the trial of some of their associates. Fighting between the work-people and the troops continued for several days, accompanied with a dreadful loss of life. The troops finally prevailed, and a telegraphic despatch of the 12th announced that "Lyons is free, and the suburbs are in possession of the troops." On the following day (the 13th) an insurrection broke out at Paris, which was speedily suppressed by the troops and the national guards. The insurrection was chiefly the work of republicans. The deputies, to the number of 288, presented a congratulatory address to the king on the occasion. The number killed was 51, of whom 12 belonged to the army. The number of persons killed at Lyons, during six days' fighting, was estimated at 5,000, of whom 1,700 were troops. The public buildings, and many hotels and dwelling-houses, were ruined or seriously injured in the struggle, which was the more protracted in consequence of General Aymar's unwillingness to expose his men in the narrow streets of the city.

10. The York column completed, and a statue of the Duke, by Westmacott, placed on the summit. Mr. B. Wyatt was the architect. Independent of the bronze statue it cost 15,760*l.*, raised by subscription. The total height is 137 feet.

10. RAJAH or COORG.—The peace of India had been disturbed by hostilities with the rajah of Coorg, an independent prince with whom we were in alliance. After a skirmishing but sharp warfare of upwards of a week, between the British forces under colonel Lindsay, and those of the rajah, the latter were defeated on all points, and the prince himself surrendered unconditionally. He is to be deposed, and his dominions annexed to the company's territories. The following is the total loss of the British in killed and wounded:—Europeans, 14 commissioned officers; 139 non-commissioned, rank, and file. Natives—2 commissioned officers; 144 non-commissioned, rank and file, and dressers. Total, Europeans and natives—16 commissioned officers, 283 non-commissioned, rank and file, and dressers.

15. A serious riot at Oldham in consequence of the apprehension of two men belonging to the trades' union of that place. One factory was nearly destroyed, and one person killed. Eight of the rioters were afterwards convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from 6 to 18 months.

17. Lord Althorp introduced the ministerial propositions for the amendment of the poor laws.—(See Aug. 15.)

21. A meeting of trades unionists, held in Copenhagen-fields, for appointing a deputation to wait on the home-secretary and present a petition for the remission of the sentence on the Dorchester convicts. The deputation proceeded to the home-office, accompanied with a vast procession through the streets, and was received by Mr. Phillips, who stated that lord Melbourne declined receiving the petition under such circumstances of intimidation, but if it were presented in a proper manner he would lay it before the king. The procession next proceeded to Kennington common and quietly dispersed. The petition was afterwards presented. The numbers assembled were estimated at 25,000, of whom—tailors, 5000; carpenters, 3194; bricklayers, 1845; plumbers, 930; bricklayers' labourers, 2500.

21. The chancellor of the exchequer moved resolutions for the abolition of church rates, and substituting in their place a grant out of the land tax amounting to 250,000*l.* a year. The resolutions were agreed to by a majority of 256 to 140. The bill, founded upon them, was afterwards dropped, from the mutual dissatisfaction of dissenters and churchmen.

22. QUADRUPLE TREATY.—A treaty of this date, concluded in London, by Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, having for its object the pacification of the two peninsular kingdoms. 1. Spain and Portugal mutually engage to assist each other in the expulsion from their respective territories of Don Carlos and Don Miguel. 2. Britain engages to co-operate by employing a naval force. 3. France engages to do all that the contracting parties in common accord shall determine upon. Some of the chief objects of this alliance it will be seen (May 9) were soon after accomplished.

Mr. O'Connell brought forward his motion, tending to the repeal of the union. He spoke for six hours. Mr. Spring Rice spoke for six hours next night in reply, and the discussion lasted for six nights. On a division, the numbers for repeal were 38, and against it 523. Mr. Kennedy was the only English member who voted in the minority. An address to the throne was afterwards agreed to, which was unanimously adopted by the lords, and presented to his majesty by deputations from both houses.

25. A royal mandate of this date abolishes the exclusive privilege of serjeants-at-law to plead in the court of common-pleas, and throws open the court to the entire bar.

28. A general "strike" of the journey-men tailors in London, by which 13,000 men are thrown out of employment. The tailors in several other towns struck in imitation of those of the metropolis. At a meeting of the master-tailors in London on the 29th, it was decided by a very large majority, that only those journeymen should be re-employed who would sign a declaration that they had ceased to be connected with any trade's union. After holding out several weeks, the men returned to their work on the terms of the masters.

May 7. Don Pedro issues a decree equalizing the amount of duties on imported goods, and thus annuls the exclusive privilege enjoyed by England in the trade with Portugal. The difference in our favour was, in some instances, 15 per cent.; but we had ourselves set the example of removing invidious distinctions between nations. In 1831 the duties on foreign wines were equalised, and the wines of France admitted at the same rate as those from our old ally, Portugal.

9. The chancellor of the exchequer moved resolutions for the reduction of the Four per Cent. Annuities. The amount of that stock was 11,000,000*l.* and the saving to the public would be about 53,000*l.* a-year.

The poor law bill was read a second time in the commons, by a majority of 319 to 20.

• A decisive battle gained by the troops of Don Pedro, on the heights of Thomas, over those of Don Miguel. Two days after they entered Santarem, which had been evacuated by Don Miguel. Don Miguel and Don Carlos finally embarked in British vessels, the former for Italy and the latter for England. A convention was entered into with Don Miguel, by which he is to receive from Portugal an income of 12,000*l.* a-year, and enjoy the rank of prince of the blood, and in return engages to give up the crown jewels, never to return to any part of the peninsula, or any way concur in disturbing its tranquillity. A protest appeared in the course of the year, in Don Miguel's name, against some parts of the treaty, of which the cortes of Portugal availed themselves to annul the treaty altogether, and to discontinue the pension of the prince. He was in consequence reduced to great poverty, and he ultimately became a pensioner of the Pope.

10. Birmingham political union dissolves itself. •

15. A motion of Mr. Tennyson, for shortening the duration of parliament, rejected by a majority of 235 to 185.

18. Mr. Jeffrey created a judge of session; Mr. Murray, member for Leith, succeeds him as lord advocate.

20. Died at Paris, aged 76, general the marquis de LAFAYETTE, a popular and distinguished name of modern history. His father was slain at Minden. At 16 he married the daughter of the duke d'Ayen, still younger than himself. Weary of the frivolities of the capital, he joined the Americans in their struggle for independence. He fought by the side of Washington, and decided the freedom of the new world by the alliance of France. When philosophy, which had been but a pastime for noble idlers, demanded sacrifices from them, Lafayette was the first to set an example, contributing powerfully in the states-general to the junction of the orders; and, by way of recompense, was appointed commander of the national guard. Apprehensive of anarchy, he denounced, in 1792, the Jacobin club to the national assembly. The majority, which at first supported the general, gradually fell away, and no resource was left to him, but either a dishonourable recantation, a death inglorious and unavailing, or the chances of a retreat into some neutral territory. He was made prisoner by the Austrians, who, during four years, kept him in close confinement. The treatment he received from the allies, showed that they were not disposed to tolerate even a moderate reformer; for Lafayette had tried to arrest the progress of the revolution under a constitutional monarchy. He visited the United States in 1824, and was enthusiastically received by the citizens. After the events of 1830 he might have been head of the French republic, but contented himself with his old appointment of chief of the civic guard; a distinction which, in a few months, he abandoned in disgust. Prince Talleyrand said he had distinguished himself by his resignation and nothing remained "but the snuff." His character was precisely a contrast to that of this diplomatic trickster. The prominent trait of Lafayette was a noble disinterestedness. This was almost in extreme; for it left an opening to men less able and deserving, and both lessened his usefulness and reputation for ability. It has been said of him—(Foreign Quarterly Review)—that "he had the moderation of Washington without his wisdom; his simplicity but not his strength; his amiability disjoined from his activity and foresight. He was therefore always respected and always forgotten." The Parisians showed their respect to his memory by attending his funeral in immense numbers; 200,000 are supposed to have been present. His simple monumental designation—Requiescat in pace—in the private cemetery of Picpus cannot be gainsaid by friends or detractors.

21. SMUGGLING.—An interesting French report has been published, of the extent to which smuggling is carried on between France and England. It is calculated that, in 1826, not less than about 45,000 cwt. of English manufactures were smuggled into France through the Netherlands by means of dogs. Dogs had been taken by the custom-house officers with burdens valued at 32*l.* to 43*l.* each. It appears that between 1820 and 1830, 40,278 of these smuggling dogs had been destroyed, and 4,833*l.* had been paid as premiums for their destruction, but the trade is nevertheless on the increase. The amount of duties evaded by the smuggling of French goods to England in 1831 was calculated at 800,000*l.* This, exclusive of tobacco, of which great quantities are imported without paying duty.

22. A motion for the repeal of the stamp duty on newspapers is rejected in the commons by a majority of 90 to 58. A motion for the appointment of authentic reporters had the same fate.

24. Session of the French chambers closed.

27. MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.—Mr. Ward made his motion relative to the Irish church. In an able speech he described the unsettled state of Ireland; said that since 1819 it had been necessary to maintain an army there of 22,000 men, which cost a million per annum, exclusive of a police force that cost 300,000*l.* more, both of which he ascribed chiefly to the maintenance of a religious establishment not in unison with popular opinion. He concluded by moving, "That the protestant, episcopal establishment in Ireland exceeds the spiritual wants of the protestant population; and that it being the right of the state to regulate the distribution of church property in such manner as parliament may determine, it is the opinion of this house, that the temporal possessions of the church of Ireland, as now established by law, ought to be reduced." Mr. Grote seconded the motion. After the mover and seconder had concluded, lord Althorp announced that he had just received communications which induced him to move that the house should adjourn till June 2, which was agreed to. It appeared that there existed a difference of opinion in the cabinet as to the mode in which Mr. Ward's motion should be met, a majority being in its favour, while the rest could not assent to its principle. It was in the end determined to issue a commission, with ample instructions to inquire into the actual condition of the Irish church, both with regard to its ministers and members. But the dissentient minority of the cabinet could neither assent to a commission of inquiry, nor to Mr. Ward's motion; inferring, that if the commission reported, as was anticipated, that the temporal possessions of the church exceeded its spiritual wants, then there would be a surplus, that, agreeably to Mr. Ward's motion, would be at parliamentary disposal, to be applied either to lay or ecclesiastical purposes. To the appropriation of church property to other than ecclesiastical uses, Mr. Stanley, Sir James Graham, the earl of Ripon, and the duke of Richmond, could not assent, and resigned their places in the ministry. The following appointments took place in consequence:—colonial secretary, Mr. Spring Rice; first lord of the admiralty, lord Auckland; lord privy seal, earl of Carlisle; master of the mint, Mr. Abercrombie; post-master general, marquis of Conyngham; president of the board of trade, Mr. Poulett Thompson; secretary of the treasury, Mr. Francis Baring; and Mr. Ellice, the secretary at war, was introduced into the cabinet. On resuming the adjourned debate, lord Althorp announced the ministerial changes, and the appointment of the church commission; but Mr. Ward, notwithstanding, pressed his motion to a division, which was negatived by 396 to 120.

27. By a decision of the general assembly of the church of Scotland, an important change has been effected in the exercise of church patronage in that country. Lord Moncrieff, a judge of session, moved that no person shall be appointed to a living who is disapproved of by a majority of the heads of families in communion with the church, and the motion was carried by a majority of 184 to 138.

28. Being the anniversary of the king's birth-day, the Irish prelates, headed by the archbishop of Armagh, presented an address to his majesty, in which they strongly deprecated ecclesiastical innovations. The king did not satisfy himself with the common formal answer, but delivered an extempore address of considerable length, in which he warmly expressed his attachment to the church. He said (Ann. Reg. lxxvi. 44) that he had always been friendly to toleration in its utmost altitude, but opposed to licentiousness, and that he was fully sensible how much both the protestant church and his own family were indebted to the revolution of 1688. "The words," said he, "which you hear from me, are spoken from my mouth, but they proceed from my heart."

Don Pedro issued a decree abolishing all convents and monasteries in Portugal; and shortly after another decree abolishing the privileges of the Oporto wine company.

June 3. On the motion of Mr. Buckingham, in the commons, a select committee is appointed to inquire into the causes, extent, and remedies of drunkenness. On the motion of Mr. C. Grant, a committee appointed to inquire into the means of promoting communication with India by steam. In place of Mr. Roebuck's motion, for inquiring into the means of establishing national education, an amendment, moved by lord Morpeth, was substituted, for inquiring into the application of a grant of last session, for erecting school houses.

An inquest held on the bodies of Matilda Archer, aged 19, and Mary Ann Perry, aged 18; the jury returned a verdict of felo de se. It appeared that the two young women, on the previous night, had tied their wrists tightly together with a silk handkerchief, and thrown themselves into the Thames, where they were found drowned next morning.

FRENCH COMMERCE.—An ordinance appeared in the Moniteur, making considerable alterations in the commercial intercourse between England and France. The prohibition on the import and export of certain articles removed; the tonnage of English vessels admitted into French ports reduced; and cotton yarn, chain cables, and other articles, are to be admitted on payment of a fixed duty. This is the commencement of a more liberal system; and it appears, from the Reports of Messrs. Bowring and Villiers, that the French are becoming more alive to the advantages of free-trade. Owing to restrictions and monopolies, the foreign commerce of France has made much less progress within the last half century, than either her agriculture or her manufactures. The value of her imports and exports together amounted, in 1787, to 25,000,000*l.* sterling; in 1830, they amounted to no more than 25,500,000*l.*, notwithstanding an increase in the population of the country from twenty-four to thirty-three millions. The small share she possesses of the immense export trade of England places in a strong light the oppressive operation of the anti-commercial regulations to which she has subjected herself. In 1830, while our exports to all Europe amounted to 34,275,387*l.*, those to France amounted only to 659,087*l.*, or about a fifty-second part of the whole. Among the European countries to which shipments of British goods were made, France ranked only the ninth in importance. In 1831, she ranked as an eighth, and received a thirty-eighth part of the exports from England to the whole of Europe.

4. The Antigua legislature dispensed with the apprenticeship clause in the Slavery Abolition Bill, and declared that the slaves in that colony should be entirely free from August 1st.

10. The installation of the duke of Wellington as chancellor of Oxford university takes place with much pomp, and a strong display of conservative feeling.

13. About this period the greater part of the Leeds trades' unionists, who had been long out of employment in consequence of a strike, returned to their work at the mills. About 45 mills and dressing-shops had been standing for many weeks.

17. The census of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land taken in September, 1833, was published. In the former the number of males was 44,643, and of females, 16,151. The population of Sydney was 16,232.

18. Don Carlos landed at Portsmouth with his family and suite. Three weeks after he left England, and suddenly appeared among his adherents in Spain.

Mr. Robert Grant is appointed Governor of Bombay, and has been succeeded by Mr. C. Fergusson as judge-advocate.

24. The grand musical festival, given in Westminster Abbey, for the benefit of the various musical societies, commenced. Their majesties attended it in state for four days. The number of performers amounted to 625, and the proceeds amounted to 22,000*l.*, the clear profits to 9,000*l.*

Messrs. Raphael and Illidge elected sheriffs of London and Middlesex. The former is the first catholic who has held the office since the expulsion of the Stuarts.

A sanguinary battle was fought at the fair of Ballyheagh, by the clans of Coleen and Lawlor. About 1,000 men, independent of women, were engaged in the bloody affray. Many were killed, and about 18 drowned in the river.

25. Admiral Napier arrived at Portsmouth in the Braganza frigate, and was welcomed with great enthusiasm by the inhabitants. His share of the prize-money for the capture of the Miguelite fleet, (valued at 120,000*l.*), was stated to be 16,000*l.*

28 Strike of the shoemakers of Derby. Colocotroni and Colliopul were convicted of treason at Nauplia, and sentenced to death. The sentence was afterwards commuted to 20 years imprisonment.

30. The editor of the Morning Post committed to custody by the lords, for a libel on the lord chancellor, charging his lordship with making a false entry of a decision of the house. Two days after he was discharged on acknowledging his error, and payment of fees.

The government prosecutions for libel, since the king's accession have been six. In these causes the defendants were:—William Cobbett, William Alcock Hailey, Richard Carlile, John Ager, Patrick Grant, John Bell, Henry Hetherington, and Thomas Stevens.

July 1. Earl Grey proposed in the house of lords the renewal of the Irish Coercion Bill, with the exception of the court-martial clauses, which were omitted.

3. A warm altercation in the commons between Mr. Littleton and Mr. O'Connell, on the Irish Coercion Bill. It appeared that Mr. Littleton had confidentially communicated to Mr. O'Connell, that the clauses in the bill prohibitory of meetings were not demanded by the Irish government and would not be pressed; nevertheless the obnoxious clauses appeared in the bill, and Mr. O'Connell considered that a deception had been practised, and that the communication had secured advantages over him which would not have been possessed, and which dissolved the obligation of secrecy, under which the communication had been made. On the 7th, Lord Althorp stated that Mr Littleton had sufficient ground for the hope he had intimated to Mr. O'Connell, that the obnoxious clauses would be omitted; but feeling the unpleasant position in which he stood in having acted on that anticipation, Mr. Littleton had tendered his resignation; but had been prevailed upon to remain in office. A stormy debate then ensued on a motion of Mr. O'Connell for copies of the correspondence between the lord lieutenant of Ireland and ministers, which was negatived by 139 to 54.

5. The queen embarked at Woolwich for the continent, to visit her relatives at Meinengen. Her majesty travels incognito, under the title of the countess of Lancaster.

9 RESIGNATION OF EARL GREY.—The resignation of Earl Grey had been preceded by that of lord Althorp, who found himself unable to carry the Irish Coercion Bill through the commons, with the clauses against public meetings, after it had become known that the lord lieutenant had advised the dispensing with these clauses, and that there was a difference of opinion in the cabinet on the necessity of their retention. Without the assistance of lord Althorp as ministerial leader in the commons, Earl Grey considered himself unable to carry on the government, and resigned. His lordship had passed his seventieth year; and, from declining health, the infirmities of age, and weariness of official life, had wished to retire at the close of last session, but had been prevailed upon by his colleagues to continue in office. The main objects with which his administration commenced had been effected:—Parliamentary reform, the great object of his public exertions, had been accomplished; peace had been maintained, without national dishonour; and taxes repealed to the amount of four and a half millions. The explanations of the seceding ministers were given on the 9th. Earl Grey was listened to with profound attention, and at one moment was so overpowered by his feelings, that he was compelled to sit down, which interval the duke of Wellington filled up by presenting some petitions. His lordship had held office, as premier, three years, seven months, and twenty-two days, which exceeded the term of his predecessor, the duke of Wellington, by nearly one year and a half. Since 1754, only four premiers have held office for a longer period, namely, the duke of Newcastle eight years, lord North twelve, Mr. Pitt upwards of seventeen, and lord Liverpool nearly fifteen years.

15. Marshal Soult quitted the French ministry, and was succeeded as president of the council and minister at war by marshal Gerard.

16. A riot took place at Madrid, in consequence of some misapprehensions relative to the cholera; the populace imagined the fountains had been poisoned, and about seventy persons were killed, chiefly monks. The number of persons who died of cholera in that capital from this period to the 21st of August was calculated at 5,000.

17. Died M. A. Taylor, M. P. aged 77. He was an old friend of Mr. Fox, and distinguished for his persevering exposition of chancery abuses. Since the retirement of Mr. Coke, he had been the father of the commons, having been a member of that assembly for fifty years.

MELBOURNE CABINET.—The completion of the ministry was announced in the commons by lord Althorp. His lordship had consented to resume his office. The following is the list of the new cabinet:—

Viscount Althorp, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Lord Brougham, Lord High Chancellor.
Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President of the Council.

Viscount Duncannon, Home Secretary.

Viscount Palmerston, Foreign Secretary.

Spring Rice, Colonial Secretary.

Lord Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Charles Grant, President of India Board.
Marquis of Conyngham, Postmaster General.

E. J. Littleton, Secretary for Ireland.

21. The lord chancellor expatiated at considerable length on the principles which should regulate the administration of relief to the poor, and concluded with moving in the lords, the second reading of the poor laws amendment bill. The motion was supported by the duke of Wellington, and other opposition peers, and agreed to by a majority of 76 to 13.

23. The circulation of paper money abolished by Don Pedro in Portugal, and a metallic currency established.

25. The amount of legacies, donations, &c., made to different charities in France, during the year 1833, was stated to be 160,000*l*.

Died at Highgate, aged 62, SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, the celebrated poet and metaphysician. This respected literator had long suffered under acute illness, and for the last thirteen months, as he told a friend, had walked seventeen hours in his chamber each day. He was the son of the vicar of St. Mary Ottery in Devonshire; was educated at Christ's Hospital, and went to Cambridge on one of the exhibitions belonging to that foundation. Like other ingenious minds, he was smitten with the opening buds of the French revolution, and while under their influence projected, in conjunction with Southey and Lovell, who had married three sisters, the establishment of a community in America upon more elementary principles than those predominant in Europe. Mr. Coleridge possessed great conversational powers; and William Hazlitt, who heard him preach at the Unitarian chapel at Taunton, has left a graphic description of his impressive appearance and pulpit oratory. As traveller, public lecturer, and general writer for the press, Mr. Coleridge had opportunities for extensive observation on the diversities of human life and character; but the variety appears to have perplexed rather than simplified his intellectual deductions. His later writings partook of the vague obscurities of German idealism, in which the realities of life are lost amidst mystic and impracticable contemplations. The English Goëthe, like his prototype, combining with religious feeling a poet's fancy and temperament, the unceasing pursuit of a metaphysician's analysis appears to have wrought out few definite and tangible conclusions in the perplexities of moral and political philosophy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward a second budget, and announced that the surplus for the year was 2,177,030*l*, and that it was his intention to take off the House tax and other taxes to the amount of a million and a half.

27. Earl Bathurst died, aged 72. He was colonial secretary for 16 years, and president of the council during the Wellington administration. His lordship was a feeble, embarrassed speaker, and of little ability. The order of the Garter he held was given to the Duke of Norfolk.

31. French chamber of deputies opened with a pacific speech from the King. The government had acquired strength by the late elections.

Aug. 1. A public dinner given at the Freemasons' Tavern, to celebrate the termination of West Indian slavery. The Earl of Mulgrave, the late governor of Jamaica, was in the chair, and the most active public supporters of emancipation were present, as were also several gentlemen of colour from the West Indies. The dissenters generally throughout the country celebrated the same event in their chapels. At Hull, the first stone of the Wilberforce testimonial was raised.

REMARKABLE AFFAIR.—Three persons, Edwards, Weedon, and Lacossyne, tried at the Middlesex sessions for attempting to obtain by force certain title-deeds, and a check for 800*l*. from Mr. Gee, a solicitor of Bishop-Stortford, on the 12th of last

May. The trial lasted thirteen hours, and the two former were found guilty of conspiring to imprison Mr. Gee, and the latter of a common assault: they were respectively sentenced to two years, one year, and six months' imprisonment. The case had excited great interest, owing to its novel circumstances. Mr. Gee was professionally employed by a person who stated herself to be a widow, of the name of Canning, to invest the sum of 2,000*l.* for her benefit. He invested 1,200*l.* of this sum, and placed the remaining 800*l.* in the hands of his banker. Mr. Gee, having been by specious pretences seduced to a house in York Street, Commercial Road, was there seized by three men, and forced through the back kitchen into a recess walled with strong boards, and plastered with mud and soil. He was there fastened by chains and cords to a board which served for a seat, and to two pieces of wood, so that he could scarcely move. The men then extorted from him an order for the title-deeds of the invested property of Mrs. Canning, and a check for the 800*l.* This was stated to be the price of his release, and was yielded by him in the fear of being murdered. One of the men, who was blind, and seemed the leader of the party, then went away with the order and the check, leaving the other men in charge of their prisoner. When Mr. Gee was left by himself, he contrived by extreme exertion to force up the chain across his breast, and to make his escape. Information having been given of these facts at the Lambeth-street Police-office, the three men were apprehended the next day. The blind man, Edwards, was a teacher of music, and had hired the house but a few days previously, and had the den constructed according to his directions, for the special purpose to which it was applied. He did not deny his part in the business, but justified it as a means of obtaining for Mrs. Canning that justice which had been quietly sought in vain. The transaction was elucidated by the fact, that Mrs. Canning had been married, under a false name, to Edwards, and that she had only a life interest in the property in question, which she was to retain while she remained a widow, and no longer.

Earl Radnor's bill for the admission of dissenters into the universities, thrown out of the lords by 102 to 85.

Leghorn opened as an entirely free port, by the cessation of the duty of one per cent. upon merchandize by sea.

5. Great inundations from heavy rains in the midland and northern counties, particularly in the vicinity of Birmingham and Manchester. Some lives were lost, and the destruction of property considerable.

At the Chester assizes, two men, named

Garside and Mosley, were indicted for the murder of Mr. Thomas Ashton, on the 8d of January, 1831. The murdered person was manager of a mill at the period when there was a dispute between the masters and turn-outs at Werneth. He was killed by a shot while passing through a lane on his way to the mill. The principal witness against the prisoners was the brother of Mosley, who was himself a party in the murder, but was admitted king's evidence against the others. It transpired on the trial that the prisoners had no personal ill-will to Mr. Ashton, but had undertaken the assassination in consideration of receiving 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* each, from the trades' union, to which Mr. Ashton had become obnoxious. The prisoners were found guilty, and sentenced to death; but the execution was delayed in consequence of a dispute between the sheriffs of the county and those of the city of Chester, each party contending that the duty devolved on the other of seeing the sentence carried into effect. They were finally executed at Horsemonger-lane, pursuant to an award of the court of King's Bench, made on the motion of the attorney-general, Nov. 6, who cited several cases to justify the interference of the court; among them that of the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh. Subsequently an act was passed (1 Win. 4. c. 1.) settling the duties of the sheriffs.

Admiral Sir Richard King, commander-in-chief in the Medway, died, aged 61, and was succeeded by Admiral Fleming. He was one of Nelson's captains at the battle of Trafalgar, and had the command on the East India station from 1816 to 1820.

8. General Sir John Doyle, died in his 78th year. He served in the four quarters of the globe, was present at twenty-three general engagements, and received public thanks on nine different occasions.

10. The Glasgow turn-out calico printers, after a nine months' struggle, have been compelled to yield to their employers. This strike has cost the employed 12,000*l.* to support the refractory.

11. The Irish Tithe Bill was rejected in the Lords by a majority of 189 to 122.

14. A great Protestant meeting, consisting chiefly of nobility and gentry, held at Dublin, and resolutions passed in support of the established church.

15. PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—The king in person prorogued parliament. After adverting to the principal labours of the session, he intimated that the important subjects of jurisprudence and municipal corporations would be introduced next session. The legislative business of the year had fallen short of that transacted in 1833, partly from ministerial disagreements and changes, and partly from the refusal of the lords to concur in measures sent up to them from the commons. Among the bills which passed the commons, and which were either rejected or so altered by the lords as to 'preclude the concurrence of the commons, were those relative to Jewish disabilities,—admission of dissenters into the universities—prevention of parliamentary corruption in Warwick—the Bribery Bill and the Coroners' Court Bill—which last was lost by the lords rejecting a clause declaring coroners' courts open courts. The two principal measures that became law were the Central Criminal Court Act and the Poor Law Amendment Act. The first of these measures was intended to improve the administration of the criminal law in the metropolis. It extends the jurisdiction of the Old Bailey Court over a population of about 1,700,000, not only in Middlesex, but in parts of Surrey, Kent, and Essex; leaving to the Middlesex sessions, at Clerkenwell, the trial of offences punishable with not more than seven years' transportation. The Old Bailey sessions to be held twelve times a year at the least, and oftener if necessary, in the city of London or the suburbs. This measure effected a great improvement in the judicial administration of the metropolis; and the outlines of it are said to have been given to the lord chancellor by an eminent barrister.

The most important measure of the session was the Poor Law Amendment Act. It was founded on inquiries and suggestions made by itinerant commissioners, who had been appointed to investigate the abuses of the poor-law administration and suggest remedies. Their suggestions were adopted by large majorities of both houses of parliament, consisting of all political parties, and excited little popular opposition, though effecting a great change in the mode of treating the indigent classes. The chief reasons upon which the new legislation was founded were the burdensome amount of the poor-rates—the temptations to improvident habits they held out—the superior condition of the pauper to an independent labourer—mal-administration of the laws through the interference of magistrates, and equality of voting—the payment of wages out of the rates—the granting of out-door allowances to able-bodied labourers—encouragement afforded to incontinence, by the allowances granted to mothers for the maintenance of illegitimate children—litigation, in consequence of the settlement-laws, &c. For the remedy of these evils, the relief of the poor was placed under the control of three commissioners appointed by the crown, who are authorised to make rules for the management of the poor, the government of work-houses, the conduct of guardians, vestries, and officers, the keeping of accounts, and making of contracts. They are also empowered to appoint assistant commissioners with similar powers, to form unions of parishes, and, in short, to direct and control every matter connected with the relief of the poor in England and Wales.

A third act for amending the statute of 1830 (see p. 691), allowing the retail of beer by an excise licence, effected important changes in the original measure. Complaints had been made of the ill-management of the beer-houses, and the new act prohibits persons selling beer to be drunk on the premises, unless expressly licensed to do so. Persons desiring to be so licensed must annually produce to, and deposit with the commissioners of excise, a certificate of good character from six inhabitants of the parish, rated at six pounds a-year each; and that they are so rated must be attested by the certificate of the overseer. Alterations were also made in the licence duties.

The session began with a formidable array of business. At the close of the preceding session there were standing in the order-book 134 notices of motions; to this number 61 more notices were added on the first day of the session; and it is supposed 200 more notices were given in the course of the session: making a total of about 400 projects of reform and change to be discussed during the six months sitting of parliament. It is needless to say that many of these unborn legislative schemes never saw the light. Among them were projects for the occasional sitting of parliament in Dublin—that the commons should rise before dinner—for a tax on Irish absentees—for the repeal of the Royal Marriage act—for securing open spaces in towns for public walks—for the abolition of the hereditary peerage—for taking elections by ballot—for the abolition of subscription to the 39 Articles in the universities—for giving publicity to lists of divisions in the house—for amending the laws against drunkenness, &c. Among measures, salutary or popular, perfected in this second session of the reformed parliament, the following may be enumerated:—

Abolition of the duty on almanacs.

Reduction of the interest of the 4 per Cents. of 1826, by which a saving of 50,000*l*. per annum was effected.

A second grant of 20,000*l*. for building schools in England.

A grant, for the first time, for building schools, of 10,000*l*. for Scotland.

Abolition of penalties on marriages celebrated in Scotland by catholic priests.

Reform of the exchequer, by which 30,000*l.* a-year will be saved.

Abolition of sinecure offices in the house of commons, and limitation of salaries.

Facilities granted for the admission and circulation through the post-office of foreign newspapers.

Colonisation of South Australia on an improved principle.

The royal assent was given to 143 private bills, of which the following is a classification:—agriculture, 18; companies, 7; improvements of towns and districts, 54; internal communications, 34; navigation, 9; private regulation, 21.

In reckoning up the parliamentary work of the year, that done by select committees of the two houses ought not to be forgotten. Among the committees appointed by the house of commons, and most of which made reports, while all diligently investigated to a greater or less extent the subjects with the examination of which they were charged, may be mentioned those on sinecure offices; on the law of libel; on the grievances complained of by certain of the inhabitants of Lower Canada; on the cases of Mr. Harvey, Mr. Buckingham, the Baron de Bode, and Mr. Gurney; on steam-navigation to India; on medical education; on the tea duties; and on the general state of the education of the poor in England and Wales.

Aug. 18. The working builders in London, to the number of 10,000, struck, in consequence of a declaration of the masters requiring them to renounce trades' unions.

A general strike among the artisans employed by government. All of them were offered employment if they would sign a declaration that they did not belong to any union. Only a very small number signed, and the rest relinquished their work.

22. Mr. Frankland Lewis, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, and Mr. Nicholls, appointed Poor Law Commissioners under the new act. Mr. Chadwick appointed secretary to the board.

27. The Cameleon revenue cutter run down by the Castor frigate, in the daytime, off Dover; and out of 19 only five of the crew were saved. The officer of the watch on board the frigate was afterwards dismissed the service in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial.

30. Don Carlos and his heirs excluded from the throns of Spain by a decision of the Cortes.

There is this year a great diminution of Irish labourers employed in getting in the harvest. It augurs well for the state of home labour in Ireland, while it restores to the English labourer an advantage of which he has for many years past been deprived.

The old ship, the Discovery, in which Captain Cook sailed round the world, has been removed from Woolwich, and is now moored off Deptford as a receiving-ship for convicts.

At the great annual sheep-fair held at Britford, near Salisbury, upwards of 80,000 sheep and lambs were sold; lambs fetching 30*s.*, ewes, 34*s.*, and wethers 35*s.* each.

Sept. 2. Mr. Telford, the celebrated civil engineer, died at his house, Abingdon-street, aged 77, and eight days afterwards his remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey. His great works are the Caledonian Canal, the Conway-bridge, the Holyhead Road, and the Menai-bridge. He was a native of the parish of Westerkirk, Dumfriesshire. By his will he left Mr. Southey, the poet, 500 guineas, which sum by a codicil he doubled.

Admiral Sir Benjamin Hallowell Carew died at Beddington Park, aged 74. He was a native of Canada, and took the name of Carew on succeeding to a large fortune. He fought under Rodney in 1782; under Nelson at the sieges of Bastia and Calvi, and commanded the Swiftsure at the battle of the Nile; and at the time of his death was one of the three surviving captains who commanded ships of the line on that memorable day.

3. A struggle at Manchester against a halfpenny church-rate terminated in the refusal of the rate, by a majority of 7019 to 5897.

Trial of the great will cause at Lancaster before Baron Gurney, which lasted 10 days, terminated in a verdict for the defendant, Mr. Wright, whose claim to the property, amounting to 7000*l.* a-year, bequeathed by the late Mr. Maraden, was disputed by admiral Tatham, the heir-at-law, on the ground of the mental imbecility of the testator.

8. The British Association held its fourth annual meeting at Edinburgh.

9. A respectable man named Steinberg, a native of Germany, residing in Southampton-street, Pentonville, destroyed in the course of the night the woman with whom he cohabited, and their four children, and then committed suicide. Embarrassed circumstances were the supposed cause. The unhappy man was buried two nights afterwards, at 11 o'clock at night, in the poor-ground of Clerkenwell parish, amidst the execrations of a vast crowd.

14. Death of Sir JOHN LEACH, master of the rolls, aged 74. His father was a tradesman of Bedford, at the grammar-school of which town sir John was educated. He was first in the office of an architect, and did not enter the Middle Temple till his twenty-fifth year. His success was rapid at the bar. By his zealous defence in the house of commons of the duke of York, when implicated in the practices of Mrs. Clarke, he became a particular favourite with the royal family. He was at the head of the Milan commission appointed to collect evidence of the irregularities of the princess of Wales, in Italy. In 1817 he became vice-chancellor, and in 1827 master of the rolls. He possessed considerable capabilities as a judge; could seize the strong points of a case, and was able to deliver his opinion immediately, in a manner clear, precise, and conclusive. He has been accused of suppleness towards the rich and powerful, and had the foible of seeking to vie, in their frivolities, with people of fashion.

15. DINNER TO EARL GREY.—A grand entertainment was given at Edinburgh to this veteran statesman in testimony of respect for his consistency and public conduct while premier. Probably no minister in the zenith of his power ever before received so gratifying a tribute of national respect as was paid on this occasion to one who had not only retired from office, but retired from it for ever. The popular enthusiasm both in the capital and other parts of Scotland was extreme, which the noble earl sensibly felt and gratefully acknowledged as among the proudest circumstances of his life. The dinner took place in a large pavilion erected for the occasion in the area of the High School, and was provided for upwards of 1500 persons, besides more than 600 who were admitted after the removal of the cloth. The principal speakers were earl Grey, the lord chancellor, and the earl of Durham. Earl Grey and the lord chancellor in their speeches considered that the reform in parliament afforded the means by which all useful improvements may be obtained without violence. Both advocated a deliberate and careful, but steady course of amelioration and reform, and both derided the idea of a reaction in favour of Tory principles of government. The Earl of Durham avowed his opinions in favour of the ballot and household suffrage, and declared that he should regret every hour which left ancient and recognised abuses unreformed.

24. DEATH OF DON PEDRO.—The prince had resigned the regency on the 18th, owing to illness, and expired at the palace of Queluz, near Lisbon, in the 37th year of his age. He was elected emperor of Brazil in 1821, abdicated in 1831, and had only survived four months the expulsion of his brother Miguel from the throne of Portugal. Don Pedro was a man of energy, and of considerable but uncultivated talents; and, owing to his violent temper, that often precipitated him into arbitrary acts, was unfit for steady government. On the resignation of the regency by her father, Donna Maria, then in her sixteenth year, was declared by the Cortes to be of age, and fully competent to take upon herself the administration of public affairs. A change of ministry followed, and the queen appointed the duke of Palmella prime minister, with Vasconcellas, Carvalho, Terceira, Villa Real, and Agostinho Freire, for a cabinet.

25. SLAVE EMANCIPATION.—Subsequently to August 1st a strong anxiety was felt in this country for intelligence as to the manner in which the boon of freedom had been received by the slaves in the different colonies. Information up to the day of emancipation has now been received from most of the West India colonies, and is highly satisfactory. There had been thankgivings and jubilees in most of the islands at the termination of personal servitude. In Jamaica there had been misapprehension as to the apprentice state, but the judicious proclamation of the Marquis of Sligo, the governor, speedily removed it. In Antigua, where the slaves had been set entirely free, most of the negroes had begun to work at the rate of 1s. a-day for able labourers, and 9d. a-day for the second class of labourers. Everywhere the colonial legislatures exhibited a willingness to give full effect to the enactment of the mother-country.

Oct. 1. The failure of Mr. Raikes, governor of the bank of England, caused some alarm in the city, lest he might have used his influence as governor to involve the bank in the speculations of the firm, to which he belonged, but the apprehension proved groundless. Another firm Bentley, Dear, and Co., doing business to the amount of 400,000*l.* yearly, were rendered bankrupt by the forgeries and subsequent disappearance of Bentley, the principal partner.

11. Lord Napier, chief superintendent of the British merchants at Canton, died suddenly at Macao. His lordship had become embroiled with the authorities by a breach of Chinese etiquette, which led to a stoppage of the tea-trade. Napier brought up two ships of war to overawe the arrogant but timid natives; they were fired upon by the forts, and the fire being returned by the ships, some lives were lost. The interdict on the trade was removed a few days after and commercial intercourse resumed.

15. A petition presented to Mr. Secretary Rice signed by upwards of 32,000 persons praying for the release of Mr. Webb from the remainder of his confinement in York Castle. Webb had been convicted of manslaughter, caused by administering Morison's pills.

16. HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BURNED. —About six o'clock in the evening a fire broke out in some buildings near the lower end of the house of lords, which continued to rage throughout the night, and was not completely extinguished for several days. The entire mass of buildings in that quarter was, at first, thought to be endangered, and great anxiety was felt for the safety of Westminster-Hall and even the Abbey, but none of these buildings sustained material damage. The libraries and state papers in the lords and commons and speaker's residence were preserved, but the Painted Chamber and two houses of parliament were entirely destroyed, with the exception, in the lords, of the library and adjoining rooms; and, in the commons, of four committee-rooms. The speaker's house was much damaged, and that of the chief-clerk destroyed. Lords Melbourne, Althorp, Hill, and Munster, sir J. C. Hobhouse, and Mr. Hume, M.P., who were on the spot, zealously assisted in arresting the progress of the flames. The privy council instituted an inquiry into the cause of the fire, and after hearing much evidence, and protracting their sittings for several days, reported to the king that the fire was caused by negligence, in burning the exchequer tallies in a building adjoining the house of lords. A singular instance of mental delusion occurred during the investigation. A Mr. Cooper swore positively to his having heard of the fire within two or three hours after it broke out (and when it was raging most fiercely) at Dudley, 120 miles from London. But no other person confirmed the extraordinary circumstance, though Mr. Cooper seemed to have no doubt whatever of the fact. The conflagration naturally caused great momentary excitement, and by it the historical and personal associations connected with an ancient place of legislative enactment, eloquence, and discussion, were destroyed.

21. The earl of Derby died at Knowsley Park, in his 82d year. He was the founder of the Derby Stakes, and had been lord lieutenant of Lancashire for 60 years.

23. A decree of Otho king of Greece was issued, by which Athens is declared the capital of the kingdom and the seat of government.

Parliament further prorogued by the lord chancellor in the library of the late house of lords. The room was temporarily fitted up for the occasion, with a mimic representation of the throne, woolsack, benches, and cross-benches, and the official persons present were wigged and robed in the usual manner.

29. A public dinner given to the earl of Durham at Glasgow. During the previous part of the day he was presented with the freedom of the city, and received a great number of addresses from various bodies. The number in the green or public park of Glasgow was calculated at 100,000.

Nov. 1. The New Central Criminal Court opened at the Old Bailey.

Incendiary fires occurred with alarming frequency in various parts of England. In most of the cases the owners were insured.

4. Marshal Gerard having previously resigned, the rest of the French ministers, De Rigny, Duchatel, Thiers, Guizot, Humann, and Persil, tendered their resignations, which were accepted, and, in a few days after, the duke of Bassano was appointed prime minister, with a new cabinet. This new ministry resigned in three days, and the former ministry, excepting Gerard, resumed office, the duke of Treviso being premier.

10. Earl Spencer died at his seat, Althorp Park, aged 76. He was first lord of the admiralty under Mr. Pitt's administration from 1794 to 1801, the period of the great naval victories of Camperdown, Cape St. Vincent, and the Nile. He retired when Mr. Addington became premier.

15. MELBOURNE MINISTRY DISSOLVED. —An extraordinary sensation produced this morning, by the announcement that the king had dismissed the ministry. It appeared that lord Melbourne had waited upon his majesty at Brighton on the 14th to take his commands on the appointment of a chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of lord Althorp, removed, by the death of his father, to the house of peers, when his lordship mentioned lord John Russell as the new leader of the house of commons. The king said he considered the government dissolved by the removal of lord Althorp; did not approve of the intended construction of the cabinet; said that lord Brougham could not continue to be chancellor; expressed his dissatisfaction with the men appointed to frame the Irish church bill; and concluded with informing lord Melbourne that he would not impose upon him the task of completing his ministerial arrangements, but would send for the duke of Wellington. In the evening, his lordship returned to town, bringing with him a letter for the duke of Wellington, who waited upon the king on the 16th (Sunday), and advised his majesty to place sir Robert Peel at the head of the administration. Sir Robert had left England, in October, for Italy. A courier was despatched, who, on the 25th, ten days after leaving Brighton, reached Rome, where he found sir Robert. Next morning the baronet started for England, arrived in London on December 9; on the same day he had an audience of the king, when he accepted the situation of premier. In the interim, the chief offices of government had been provisionally filled by the duke of Wellington. Lord Lyndhurst accepted the seals, but did not resign his office of chief baron of the exchequer till the administration was completed. The latter office lord Brougham offered to fill without salary, merely retaining his retiring pension as ex-chancellor.

15. Lord Stanley elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow. He had 298 votes; his opponent, lord Durham, 163.

17. A public dinner was given to Mr. Cobbett in Dublin. Sir George Cockburn presided, and two or three Irish members of parliament were present.

Mr. Green, the aeronaut, having rashly ascended from North Shields without car, grappling-irons, or ballast, narrowly escaped being drowned by his balloon rapidly falling into a deep part of the Tyne with such velocity that Mr. Green was forced to the bottom (about nine feet and a-half), and stuck in the mud. He had presence of mind, however, to retain his hold of the cord to which he was slung, when he was extricated by the re-ascent of the balloon, and dragged along the water for about fifteen minutes, until he was picked up in a boat.

27. An action was brought against the rev. Robert Taylor, the public lecturer, for breach of promise of marriage, and a verdict given of 250*l.* damages.

30. The duke of Gloucester died at Bagshot Park, aged 58. He was born at Rome; his father was third son of Frederick Lewis prince of Wales. The duke married, in 1816, his first cousin the princess Mary, sister to the king.

A baronetcy has been conferred on Mr. Felix Booth, the gentleman by whose munificent assistance captain Ross was enabled to undertake his expedition to the Polar seas.

Dec. In the beginning of the month, public meetings were held in Westminster, Lambeth, Finsbury, and Marylebone, to pass resolutions expressive of a determination not to be deprived of the fruits of the reform bill by a tory ministry.

6. Died at Glasgow, in his 43rd year, the Rev. EDWARD IRVING, a minister of the Scottish church, who experienced the common fate of men resorting to factitious artifices, in rising into a sudden but transitory notoriety. His sermons, or, as he called them, "erations," affected originality of ideas, and the style of Milton, Jeremy Taylor, and the old writers. These novelties, combined with a remarkable personal appearance and gesticulation, thronged his chapel in London with persons of rank and fashion, who were admitted by tickets. His popularity became such, that his admirers projected a handsome chapel for his accommodation, but, before it was completed, the nine days' wonder had ceased. A revival of the public interest was attempted, by means of prophesyings in an "unknown tongue;" which imposture was detected, mixed up with disordered intellects, and some portion, perhaps, of mistaken enthusiasm.

10. SIR ROBERT PEEL'S MINISTRY.—Immediately sir Robert had accepted the office of first minister, he proposed to lord Stanley and sir James Graham to form part of the new administration, but both declined to pledge themselves to the extent they might be considered bound by, accepting office. In consequence, the minister was left entirely to his tory connexions who had opposed the reform bill, or had adopted conservative principles. The following is a list of the Peel ministry:—

Duke of Wellington, Foreign Secretary.

Earl of Aberdeen, Colonial Secretary.

Lord de Grey, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Sir Edward Knatchbull, Paymaster of the Forces.

Sir George Murray, Master General of the Ordnance.

Duke of Dorset, Master of the Horse.

Marquis of Winchester, Groom of the Stole.

Lord G. Somerset, First Commissioner of Land Revenues.

C. W. W. Wynn, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Sir F. Pollock, Attorney-General.

Sir W. W. Follett, Solicitor-General.

Sir Edward Baggan, Lord Chancellor.

Sir R. H. Vivian, Commander of the Forces.

Joseph Jackson, Solicitor-General.

13. After six days' polling, the parishioners of Birmingham refused to assess themselves to a church-rate; the number for the rate being only 1723, against them 6699. There had been no church-rates paid for three years, the incidental expenses of churches and chapels having been paid by voluntary subscription.

16. M. Rouen, the editor of the National, was tried by the chamber of peers for a libel on that assembly, in having declared it incompetent to try the men concerned in the riots at Lyons. After a powerful speech from his counsel, M. Carrel, he was convicted, and sentenced to be imprisoned for two years, and pay a fine of 10,000 francs. The sentence was deemed severe, and public feeling was strongly excited in consequence against the peers.

18. Sir Robert Peel, in an address to the electors of Tamworth, announced the principles on which the new ministry intended to act. They may be summed up in these words:—the maintenance of the reform bill as a final and irrevocable settlement—the correction of proved abuses and real grievances—the preservation of peace—resistance to the secularization of church property in any part of the United Kingdom—the fulfilment of existing engagements with foreign powers—strict economy—and a just and impartial consideration of what is due to all interests, agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial.

23. A tumultuous meeting took place at the City of London Tavern. The avowed object of the meeting was to vote an address to the King expressive of approbation of his conduct, in the dismissal of the late ministry; but that object was defeated by a strong muster of reformers headed by Mr. Grote, and, after a scene of extraordinary confusion, the meeting broke up without passing any resolution. On the same evening the lord mayor gave at the Mansion House a dinner to sir R. Peel, and others of the new ministry, with a select party of friends. Sir Robert, on his health being drank, gave a brief exposition of the principles on which the new ministry intended to act, and expressed a hope that it would be supported.

24. The Liverpool market was never better stored than it was on Christmas eve. One steamer from Ireland brought no less than fifteen tons of plucked geese, which were sold at from 18d. to 3s. each. It is estimated that there were not less than eight thousand turkeys in the market.

29. Died at Bath, in his 69th year, the Rev. THOMAS ROBERT MALTHUS, the celebrated author on population.

He was born at the Rookery, near Dorking, and was the younger son of a private gentleman of independent fortune. His Essay on Population was first presented to the public in 1798, chiefly intended as a refutation of the notions of Condorcet and Godwin on human perfectibility, to the realization of which Mr. Malthus held that the tendency of mankind to multiply beyond the means of subsistence would always present an insurmountable obstacle. Finding that his subject required a further and more careful investigation, he, in 1800, visited every country in Europe accessible to English travellers, observing attentively every fact likely to elucidate, confirm, or disprove his conclusions. The fruits of these researches he carefully digested and arranged, and, having embodied with them his first Essay, he published them in a quarto volume. In 1804 he was appointed to the chair of History and Political Economy in the East India Company's college in Hertfordshire, a situation which he filled till his death. He was a man of great amiability of disposition, and the highest virtue,—his life being devoted to inquiries into the causes and remedies of human misery. Observing that the insufficiency of food, arising out of an excess of consumers, was everywhere the primary source of crime and want; the great difficulty to surmount in the progress to social virtue and enjoyment is the co-adequation of population to subsistence; and, as this must be mainly effected by the poor themselves, they are the chief architects of their own happiness. Had this doctrine been promulgated less with an air of discovery, and more as axioms which Wallace, Young, Franklin, and preceding writers, had unhesitatingly admitted, it would probably have encountered less hostility from the religious and natural feelings of mankind. It was welcomed, however, by the rich, who gladly seized the excuse as a solace for indolence; and, hastily concluding that all the ameliorating services which they could render the poor being merely as dust in the balance compared to those which the poor could render themselves, there was not any utility in, nor obligation imposed upon them, to interfere for the amendment of their condition. So far, the tendency of the new principles was pernicious; they hardened the hearts and damped the active benevolence of the intelligent affluent. But the evil must be temporary; for it is plain that the obligations of humanity are as imperative as ever, only they require to be differently answered by fixing attention on the hitherto neglected sources of national suffering.

30. First reformed parliament dissolved by proclamation. It had existed one year and eleven months.

An address to the king in support of the ministry, from the merchants, bankers, ship-owners, traders, and others connected with the city of London, bearing 5730 signatures, delivered to Sir R. Peel, by a deputation consisting of Messrs. Ward, Lyall, Lucas, Wilson, and Brown. The list of names and residences occupied 27 columns of The Times, and 240 guineas was charged for its insertion in that newspaper.

In Dublin an association was formed, shortly after the dissolution of the late ministry, which has been termed the "anti-tory association," and which includes nearly forty members of parliament. The political meetings in England and Scotland have been very numerous.

This year has been remarkable for the high temperature of the weather. In the course of the summer the thermometer often ranged between 74 and 83 of Fahrenheit, and on the 30th instant it stood at 53 in the shade at noon. It is also remarkable for the progressive rise which has taken place in most public securities, both British and foreign.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE.—It has lately formed an especial object of the legislature to afford relief to this branch of industry, by a diminution in poor-rates, tithes, church rates, and county-rates. Upon the last, both houses of parliament made inquiries during the last session. In the report of the lords' committee it is stated that, upon a comparison of the county expenditure taken at decennary periods from 1792 to 1832, the increase has been both progressive and considerable. The county-rates in 1792 in England and Wales amounted to 315,805*l.*, and in 1832 to 783,417*l.*, being an increase of 148 per cent. The items that have increased most enormously are the expenses of constables and prosecutions. In a second report, a more uniform and efficient system of prison discipline, as well as a more effective parochial constabulary, are recommended.

RUSSIA.—Little more than half a century has sufficed to extend the sway of Russia from the Gulf of Bothnia to the banks of the Pruth, and from the Araxes to the Vistula; whilst she has added, within that interval, an amount of population to her native resources which is nearly equal to that of the United Kingdom. The following is an enumeration of her territorial acquisitions, and the number of inhabitants they contain:—

1771, The Crimea (incorporated 1783)	460,000

1785, Georgia (incorporated 1831) 400,000

1793, Little Poland and the Ukraine 5,500,000

1794, Western Russia, including Lithuania, Podolia, &c. 8,500,000

1795, Courland 400,000

1803, The Leghis and other Caucasian tribes 300,000

1813, Schirwan 140,000

1809, Finland 1,400,000

1815, Kingdom of Poland (incorporated 1832) 4,000,000

1827, Erivan and districts adjacent 150,000

1829, Turkish Armenia, and other cessions by Turkey 500,000

NEW COLONY IN AUSTRALIA.—Government has resolved to form a new settlement on the southern coast of Australia, near Spencer's Gulf, which contains a fine harbour named Port Lincoln. Five millions of acres of rich land approximate on St. Vincent's Gulf, and abut on the Murray River, which is navigable for large craft, for some thousand miles in an easterly direction. Kangaroo Island lies off the entrance of these two gulfs, and abounds in salt, fish, seals, kangaroos, and possesses a good soil. The whole lies in latitude from 34° to 36° S., and in E. longitude from 136° to 140°. An interesting feature in this establishment is, that all the land is to be sold, and the produce to be expended in the encouragement of agricultural families to emigrate. Another feature consists in avoiding the error committed in the Swan River settlement, from the dispersion of the settlers, by keeping them locally concentrated for the benefit of mutual intercourse and co-operation.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Rev. Daniel Lysons, author of the Environs of London, and, in conjunction with his brother, of Magna Britannia. William Mellish, esq., who left property nearly amounting to three millions, acquired chiefly by contracts for provisioning the navy during the war; he had also an extensive business as ship-owner: his wealth devolved on two daughters, one married to lord Edward Thynne, the other to the earl of Glengall. At Fernando, Richard Lander, 30, the enterprising African traveller. William Thwaites, about 90, tea-dealer of Fenchurch-street, who died worth upwards of 700,000*l.* personal property, of which 500,000*l.* and upwards was left to his widow, the rest in legacies to relatives, the cloth-workers' company, and to charities.

and his estate, being to be sold not being without some of his property, the fair-at law, John M. de Bouchenne, 64, a schoolmaster at Newington & Brieune, and author of a valuable history of that extraordinary martyr. The July revolution, combined with the loss of his property, is supposed to have deprived him of reason, and he died in a lunatic asylum. At Chester, Harts, M. Susan Cromwell, 90, daughter of the protector of Cromwell, and the last of that name. At Hampstead, suddenly, Julian Gilbert, 42, a gentleman of fortune, who had lately attracted notice by the open avowal of atheism in a court of justice;

 he made a will, apparently in contemplation of approaching death, bequeathing his body to the interests of science, and his personal property in legacies to those who had evinced zeal in what he conceived to be the cause of truth and human freedom. At Serampore, in the East Indies, rev. William Carey, 73, the eminent Christian missionary, and distinguished Oriental scholar. At his lodging in the Danish Hong at Canton, rev. Robert Morrison, D.D., 53, eminent Chinese scholar, who in 1811 printed in that language at Canton, from wooden blocks, the Acts of the Apostles: on the arrival of lord Napier at Macao. Dr. Morrison had been appointed secretary to the commission for superintending British affairs in China.
 Within the rules of the King's Bench prison, Mrs. Olivia Serres, 63, the self-styled princess Olive of Cumberland, and very notorious impostor (see p. 791). In Throgmorton-street, Alexander Chalmers, 76, a native of Aberdeen, and well-known editor and compiler of many voluminous publications. Mr. Chalmers commenced his literary career about the same time as the late James Perry, proprietor of the Morning Chronicle; the latter as a writer in the General Advertiser, and the former as editor of the Public Ledger. Henry Bankes, esq., 77, long M.P. for his family borough of Corfe Castle, and an active supporter of Mr. Pitt and his successors in the same line of policy. At Edinouton, Charles Lamb, 60: this very amiable man and popular Essayist was a native of Lincolnshire; educated at Christ's Hospital, and from 1759 till 1825 a clerk in the India House, when he retired with a handsome annuity for life. A list of his literary works is given among the "Men of Letters," of this reign; but, as he himself used pleasantly to remark, his chief works remain in M.S. deposited in the archives of the East India Company. Rudolph Ackerman, 70, eminent printseller, who first introduced the art of lithography, and the "Annuals" into this country. At an advanced age, James Biddles, long known as the rich money-lending shoe-contractor of Bishopsgate-street, and who, by penurious habits, accumulated property to the amount of 200,000*l.* and upwards.

 At Putney, William Jones, 84, marshal of the King's Bench prison. John Fuller, 77, formerly M.P. for Sussex, and a liberal patron of the British Institution. Thomas Stothard, R.A., 78, librarian to the Royal Academy, and distinguished artist. At Carlow, Rev. James Doyle, eminent catholic prelate and polemical divine. Dr.
 Doyle was the first to propagate in this country the Hobenloe miracles, in the reality of which he appears to have believed.
 Sir Gilbert Blane, M.D., 85, physician to the king, and author of several medical tracts. Edward Pidgeon, 54, a gentleman of literary acquirements, and one of the translators of Cuvier's Natural History.
 Thomas C. W. Mahew, 28, a miscellaneous writer, who having become embarrassed in pecuniary matters, put an end to his existence by prussic acid. At Dublin, A. Hamilton Rowan, 83, formerly convicted of treason. Rowland Detrouer, a public lecturer of promising talents. At Florence, Gwyllym Lloyd Wardle, 72, formerly M.P. for Oakhampton, and who obtained great ephemeral popularity by bringing forward his charges against the duke of York. At Brighton, Prince Hoare, 80, secretary to the Royal Academy.

A.D. 1835. JAN. STATE OF PARTIES.
 —The difficulties which had beset the late Whig ministry were of two kinds.
 There was the pressure without and resistance within the government. If the measures they brought forward were not of a popular character, they were compromised with the people, on whose support they mainly depended; while, on the other hand, if too radical, there was no chance of forcing them through the strait gate of the upper house of parliament. During the past year the king manifested symptoms of reviving conservatism, and is supposed to have intended to break up the ministry on the resignation of earl Grey (Speeches of Lord Brougham, iv., 90, 248);
 but the prompt declaration of lord Brougham and others, that they had no intention of following that statesman's example by resigning, induced him, contrary to his wish, to continue them longer in office. The warm protestant address, either delivered by or ascribed to his majesty, to the Irish prelates, was trumpeted through the country, and dwelt upon as a proof of the king's dislike to the ministerial plan of church inquiry and reform.
 This appears to have been the main cause of the dismissal of the ministry; and the removal from the commons of lord Althorp, and the oratorical tour of the lord chancellor in the North, only secondary texts. Moreover, the loss of popularity by the Melbourne cabinet, and the impression which had gained ground that it was weak and incompetent, offered a favourable opportunity for their dismissal. It was looked upon as only the residuum of the original Grey ministry; and the losses it had sustained, by the withdrawal of the earl of Durham, the Stanley section, and the noble premier himself, had not been supplied by the strength and quality of the new infusions. Lord Durham was looked upon as a man of energy, and popular principles, who had felt compelled so often to dissent from the feebleness of his colleagues that he acquired among them the name of the 'dissenting minister.' In Mr. Stanley and Sir James Graham the administration sustained a loss of firmness of principle, parliamentary talent, and official ability; but the dogma they had taken up on the non-secularization of church property formed a serious obstacle to the progress of the ecclesiastical reforms to which public opinion was imperatively directed. The retirement of earl Grey, as before mentioned, was mainly on private grounds, accelerated perhaps by the death of lord Spencer, and the perplexities that grew out of the renewal of the Irish coercion bill. By these defections the main supports of the ministry were gone; what remained was held forth as merely 'lath and plaster,' whose sudden removal by the king excited the surprise, but not in an intense degree the regret, of the nation. After the close of the parliamentary session it had been assailed by Mr. O'Connell, with his wonted tact and power of vituperation, in a series of letters addressed to lord Duncannon. The press attacked it for dilatoriness in its reform movements, and the incapacity of its members; dwelling with particular force on the inconsistencies of lord Brougham in the autumn, in the alternate championship of radicalism and conservatism, and, especially, his lordship's alleged declaration at Inverness, that 'if little had been done in the last session less would be done in the next.' The shopkeepers were dissatisfied with the continuance of the window-duties; the agriculturists with the malt-duty; the political economists with the corn-laws; the friends of popular intelligence with the retention of the newspaper-stamp; and the speculative radicals with a refractory peerage, and the resistance that it had offered to further organic change. Amidst these discontents the debris of the great reform ministry of 1830 disappeared. No sooner, however, was the arena cleared, and the new performers announced, than an extraordinary requiescence ensued in the general assembly. With the advent of Toryism were associated recollections of former struggles between men who had given substantial proofs of their zeal in the cause of reform, and those by whom its vital changes had been pertinaciously resisted, there seemed no ground for a moment's hesitation. So well convinced was Sir Robert Peel of the predominant state of the national feeling, and of the utter impracticability of a resolute reversal, sufficient to sustain him in power, that he never once attempted to base his administration on the legitimate and often-avowed maxims of his party. The constitution had been fundamentally changed, and it was no longer possible for any minister to carry on the government in opposition to the settled and declared sense of the nation. Conforming himself to this altered and irrevocable settlement, his first act was to solicit the co-operation of men who had themselves been the able and eloquent supporters of representative reform. Failing in his overture to Mr. Stanley and his friends, he took the earliest opportunity to make a public declaration of the principles according to which he proposed to administer state affairs. They were strictly those of a whig reformer. He appealed to his past life, to his currency bill, the jury act, and his acts for the amendment and consolidation of the criminal law, as proofs that he was not opposed to the redress of real grievances, and the removal of all recognised abuses. He was not unfriendly to extending some relief to the dissenter, nor to judicial, municipal, economical, and ecclesiastical reforms; but on the last he carefully guarded himself against sanctioning the secular appropriation of church property. With all these concessions to popular opinion, which were explicitly and manfully made, it was impossible not to discern an essential difference between the claims to public confidence of the new and the old ministry. The joy felt at the repentance of one prodigal son was naturally great and heartfelt, but in the estimation of right-minded men a preference was due, a deeper debt of gratitude owing, to those who had actually practised, than to those who only promised to be righteous. Among the colleagues of Sir R. Peel were recognised the old opponents of popular rights, whose biographies were associated with oppression, whose hands were yet unclean. Few or none could bring characters unfainted by intolerance or jobbing to the new master sinto whose service they were eager to enter. It was impossible that those who had opposed the Reform Act could, if they had been sincere, faithfully watch over and mature its natural fruits. These differences determined the current of national opinion in the urgent crisis that marked the commencement of the present year. A common danger threatened the reformers, and minor disagreements were forgotten or laid aside. In Ireland the agitation of repeal was suspended; in England the ballot, extension of suffrage, the triennial act, and a reform of the house of lords. Scotland remained grateful to the men who had first given her political existence. Whigs and radicals everywhere coalesced, and the electors of the United Kingdom became consolidated into the two great parties, of those friendly, and those opposed, to the Peel ministry. The new parliament exhibited a similar political division, save the Stanley section, which professed to be neutral; neither would Sir F. Burdett, nor Mr. Cobbett, identify himself with the opposition.

Jan. 5. Mr. D. W. Harvey and Mr. Humphreys returned without opposition for Southwark; and were the first members returned to the new parliament.

9. The arrival of president Jackson's message in France produces great excitement by its threatening import. The cause of dispute has been noticed, (Mar. 27, 1834,) and arose out of certain claims of indemnification by America on France, for property destroyed during Buonaparte's wars, and which had been repeatedly admitted by successive French administrations, and promised to be liquidated, not having been paid. After some negotiation, during which the French ambassador was about to be recalled from Washington, and the American minister at Paris had demanded his passport, the French government concluded that it was better to be just than valiant, and agreed that the money should be forthcoming.

26. At the sitting of the Tribunal de Premier Instance at Paris, a process was instituted by the duke of Cambridge, against Charles, ex-duke of Brunswick, for the purpose of having all the property of the latter placed in his hands, according to arrangements which were represented to have been made between William IV., the reigning duke of Brunswick, the duke of Cambridge, and other members of the family; and by which the duke of Brunswick was placed under the guardianship of the duke of Cambridge, who now sought to obtain possession of the duke's property in France. Duke Charles appeared in person to plead his cause. The Tribunal decided that it had no power to interfere as prayed for, and condemned the duke of Cambridge to pay the costs of the suit.

GENERAL ELECTION.—By the dissolution, the Peel ministry obtained a greater majority of strength than was expected, but it was not sufficiently reinforced to enable it to carry on the government. In the counties and boroughs the whigs and radicals lost about a hundred seats. These victories, however, still left the conservatives a minority, in the proportion of 302 to 356. There were 184 new members returned. The contests were unusually numerous and severe, but, owing to the great improvements effected by the Reform Acts, there was little rioting, and none of a serious description. A remarkable feature of the elections was the closeness of the poll. In several cases the successful candidate had only a majority of about half a dozen, and in one or two instances a single vote turned the scale. The Liverpool election was keenly contested. The last hour was critical. In every direction were seen vans, gigs, and flies in rapid motion, and the price of a vote rose from 15*l.* to 25*l.* All the metropolitan boroughs were spiritedly struggled for, but not a single ministerialist could obtain a seat; and even conservative whigs were rejected, as in Marylebone and Finsbury, to make way for radicals. The sixteen city and suburban members were in general men of the ballot, of an extended suffrage, of short parliaments, voluntary churches, and an elective house of lords, or no lords at all. On the other hand, the towns of Bristol, Exeter, Newcastle, Hull, Warrington, Halifax, York, and Leeds, dismissed each of them a whig, to return a tory. So far as England was concerned, ministers had a majority, chiefly through the county representatives. In Scotland the balance of parties remained nearly the same. Whigs were ousted from five counties; they succeeded in three where they had formerly failed, and in one of these, Sir George Murray, the new master general of the ordnance, was rejected. Nothing could be more conservative than the elective peerage of Scotland. In the late parliament it contained only one nobleman, lord Elphinstone, of whiggish propensities; he was left out, and lord Keay substituted. It was Ireland that mainly gave the opposition their preponderance, but even here the retinue of Mr. O'Connell was rather diminished. His energy and vast influence, however, made him generally successful. Radicalism, with the addition of repeal, formed the creed of his candidates. On the Dublin hustings he said, "Sink or swim, live or die, I am for repeal." Exclusive trading, and other threats of intimidation were employed. "Every one," declared the agitator, "who votes for the orange knight of Kerry, shall have a death's head and cross bones painted on his door." The knight of Kerry was thrown out. Mr. O'Connell was returned for Dublin, by a majority of only 217, and his colleague, Mr. Ruthven, had still fewer, and the returns of the successful candidates were disputed.

Feb. 3. In the Gazette appears the names of the royal commissioners appointed to consider the several dioceses in England and Wales, with reference to their revenues and duties; the prevention of attaching by commendum benefices with cure of souls to bishoprics; also for considering the state of the cathedral and collegiate churches, with a view to the suggestion of remedies conducive to the efficiency of the church, and the prevention of non-residence.

7. Joseph Ady, a well-known quaker, who endeavoured to earn a subsistence by writing letters to individuals informing them that, on receiving a fee, he would inform them of something to their advantage, was tried in the Central Criminal Court, for obtaining money on false pretences. He was found guilty, and sentenced to seven years' transportation.

9. Mr. O'Gorman Mahon, late M.P. for Clare, indicted Mr. Wigley, an attorney, for perjury, in the court of king's bench. Mr. Wigley was acquitted, and on the parties leaving the court a quarrel ensued, when Mr. Mahon struck Wigley a severe blow on the face. He was brought back in custody, and was committed for three days for contempt of court. On giving bail to meet the charge of assault, he was released.

9. NEW PARLIAMENT opened by commission. It met in temporary chambers that had been erected for the accommodation of the legislature on the site of those that had been destroyed by the fire of last year. The commons occupied the site of what was the house of lords—the lords that of the painted chamber. A sharp struggle for the speakership was anticipated, as it was known both parties intended to propose a candidate, and the issue was looked forward to as a trial of strength. Accordingly, on the first day of the session there was a larger assemblage of members than had ever before been collected. The re-election of Sir C. M. Sutton was proposed by lord F. Egerton, and the motion was seconded by Sir C. Burrell; after which, Mr. W. J. Denison proposed Mr. Abercromby, and Mr. W. Ord seconded the motion. A debate of some length followed, in which the principal speakers, besides Sir C. M. Sutton and Mr. Abercromby, were, for the motion of Lord F. Egerton, Lord Stanley and Sir Robert Peel; and for that of Mr. Denison, lord John Russell. About six o'clock the house divided, when the numbers were 306 for Sutton, and 316 for Abercromby; a result hailed with loud cheering by the majority.

11. Death of earl Darnley at his seat, Cobham Hall, from the effects of an accident. He had been giving directions to some workmen, and took up a woodman's hooked bill to lop off a branch, but unfortunately separated two of his toes. His lordship was in his 40th year.

15. Died at Alresford, Hampshire, HENRY HUNT, late M.P. for Preston, a gentleman who, since his first appearance at the Spa-fields meeting in 1816, had taken a leading part in the proceedings of the radical workpeople. He was born at Widdington Farm, on Salisbury plain, and for many years regularly attended Devizes market. After his father's death he was elected chairman of the table in the large dining-room of the farmers at the Bear inn; the daughter of the landlord of which inn, Miss Halcumb, he married. After a conjugal union of many years, he separated from this lady, owing to an unfortunate, and, according to his own account of the matter in his "Memoirs," written by himself in Ilchester Gaol, an uncontrollable attachment he had conceived at Brighton for the wife of colonel Vince, with whom he afterwards lived. As private character is essential to public confidence, this dereliction in moral conduct operated greatly to his disadvantage in his subsequent aims at political notoriety. Though fond of pleasure, no man attended more strictly to his farming business, and no farms in the kingdom were managed better, or in higher condition, than his. He had the best flock of Southdown sheep in the county, the wool of which sold for the highest prices. In 1801, when the apprehension of an invasion was so great that circulars were addressed to the churchwardens, requiring from every parish a return of live and dead stock; in Mr. Hunt's schedule was an enumeration of possessions hardly inferior to those of Job prior to his desolation,—namely, of wheat, 1600 sacks; barley, 1500 quarters; oats, 4500 quarters; hay, 250 tons; cart-horses, 30, value from 30 to 70 guineas each; working oxen, 10; cows, 20; sheep, 4200: all which he offered to place at the disposal of government, in the event of an invasion. A violent altercation with lord Bruce, commander of the Marlborough troop of yeomanry, of which Mr. Hunt was a member, involved him in a criminal prosecution, that terminated in sentence of imprisonment for six weeks for a breach of the peace. An impression of lordly wrong, or the fact of meeting with Waddington and some other radicals in prison, seems to have determined his subsequent political course, the chief incidents in which have been noticed among the domestic occurrences of the time. A seat in parliament was long an object of Mr. Hunt's ambition; he contested the representation of Bristol in 1812; stood once for Westminster, and twice for the county of Somerset, but was unable to succeed till the excitement of the Reform Bill in 1830 enabled him to defeat Mr. Stanley for Preston. He was re-elected in 1831, but in the following year the Derby interest resumed its sway in that borough. Mr. Hunt had left London on a journey of business to the West of England, where he had considerable connexion, for the sale of shoe-blackening and annatto, or cheese colouring, and was in the act of stepping from his phaeton, when he was seized with a violent fit of paralysis that proved fatal. He was a man of considerable natural shrewdness and readiness of reply, without literary cultivation; perverse in disposition, greedy and vain of vulgar applause; and was little scrupulous about the weapons he used to combat his adversaries. His favourite element was the conflicts of popular assemblages, and he was such a determined bidder for mob favour, reckless whether the price could be paid or not, that he always set competition at defiance. Thus, when one of his opponents had proposed to extend the elective suffrage to every male person 21 years old, Hunt boldly offered to extend it to every male 18 years of age. Against such a rival there was no standing, it being impossible by any plunge ever to reach the nethermost abyss by which he kept alive his loved vocation of popular excitement and leadership. In person he was a fine man, and in this respect it was a common boast of Mr. Cobbett, in his Weekly Register, that the London newspaper press could not produce two individuals to match them.

24. The king opened the business of the first session of the SECOND REFORMED PARLIAMENT. After adverting to the state of foreign relations, which did not offer any points of interest, his majesty informed the commons that the estimates were framed with the strictest regard to economy; admitted the state of commerce and trade to be satisfactory, but suggested the relief of agriculture by the transfer of some of its burdens to property of another description. Attention was called to a final and equitable settlement of the tithe question in Ireland. Measures would be proposed for the commutation of tithe in England, for the improvement of judicial administration, of church discipline, and the relief of dissenters in the marriage ceremony. Attention was directed to the church of Scotland, and to the means by which the opportunities for religious instruction might be increased to the poorer classes; and the speech concluded with assurances of reliance on the caution which would be exercised in altering laws that affected complicated interests, and were interwoven with ancient usages. In the lords, an amendment to the ministerial address was moved by viscount Melbourne, expressive of a hope that the king's councils would be directed in a spirit of well-considered and effective reform, and lamenting the late dissolution of Parliament. After an acrimonious debate, it was negatived without a division. In the commons a similar amendment was proposed by lord Morpeth, which, after a debate of three nights, was carried by 309 to 302, leaving the ministers in a minority.

28. Died, in his 78th year, earl Nelson, brother of the celebrated admiral. The heir to the titles, a nephew of the naval hero, after enjoying the honour for a few months, died, 31st Oct. He is succeeded by his son, a boy ten years of age.

March 2. Died, in the 67th year of his age, and the 43d of his reign, the Emperor FRANCIS. He was the last elective emperor of Germany, having resigned the title on the formation of Napoleon's confederation of the Rhine, and he was the first emperor of Austria. He had witnessed wonderful changes of fortune. His capital twice entered by the victorious French, and his most valuable provinces severed from his sway, he was compelled to purchase the retention of a diminutive sovereignty by yielding up his daughter to the embraces of a military adventurer. All these wounds were healed, and he lived to see his conqueror perish an exile on a rock. By a surprising course of events, in the production of the principal of which Nature more than man was instrumental, his lost dominions were restored to him, and he left his empire as powerful as he had found it. Buonaparte considered the Austrian monarchy almost indestructible. After many beatings he said of it, "Cette vieille maison d'Autriche ne meurt jamais!" It was English subsidies, which brought to its aid the self-population of Hungary and Bohemia, that preserved its vitality. Francis was a simple, upright man, without shining abilities. Bred to despotism, he had no idea of anything better, and thought it the best regimen both for himself and subjects. His death made no change in Austrian politics: prince Metternich had long had the direction of the government, whose system was adopted by his son and successor the emperor Ferdinand.

3. Sir Charles Manners Sutton, late speaker of the house of commons, created viscount Canterbury. He had filled the chair during eighteen years. His command of temper, dignity of manner, and powerful voice, admirably fitted him for the office. Though a conservative, he had been chosen with the approval of ministers to preside over the first reform parliament.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Thames tunnel, held at the City of London tavern, it was announced that government had placed in the hands of the directors a sum which the engineer thought would be sufficient to complete the work. This sum was 247,000*l.* in exchequer bills, advanced on the security of the property.

10. Marquis of Chandos, in the commons, moved a resolution for the repeal of the malt-tax. It was strenuously opposed by Sir R. Peel, who was supported by most of the opposition, with the exception of Mr. Hume. When the house divided, the numbers for the resolution were 192 against 350. Several members voted for its continuance in violation or evasion of pledges given to their constituents.

12. The attorney-general brought in bills for the reform of the ecclesiastical courts, and for the maintenance of church discipline. Mr. Hume said ministers had crept into the nest of their predecessors, and were hatching their eggs.

14. The Monitor announced the reconstruction of the French ministry, after a tedious interregnum. The only change was in the prime minister, the duke de Broglie replacing marshal Mortier, and MM. Thiers, Guizot, and the rest, resuming their offices. The difficulties in forming an efficient ministry were ascribed to the unwillingness of independent men to become members of a cabinet entirely governed by the will of the king himself. Within about eight months three premiers had resigned; three different cabinets had been dissolved, and the series of changes had terminated by restoring to their offices the men with whom the cycle of resignations had begun.

17. Sir R. Peel explained in the commons the nature of his measure for affording relief to dissenters, relative to the marriage ceremony. It met with general approval in the house and from the sectaries.

19. Mr. O'Brien moved that a provision be made, by an assessment on property, for the relief of the aged, infirm, and helpless poor in Ireland. It was opposed by Mr. O'Connell, and also by Mr. Sheil. The necessity of some provision was generally admitted. Motion withdrawn.

20. Sir H. Hardinge brought forward the ministerial plan for the settlement of the Irish tithe question. By this scheme it was proposed that tithe in future should be recoverable only from the chief landlord; that the owner should be entitled to demand only 75 per cent. on the amount to which he has at present a right; that the tithe should be redeemable by the landlord at twenty years' purchase, calculated upon the diminished rate; that the proceeds thus arising should be invested in land or otherwise, for the benefit of the tithe-owners; that the tithe arrears of 1834 should be paid out of the residue of the million advanced out of the consolidated fund for the relief of the clergy, and repayments on the advances already made under the million act should be remitted. Lord John Russell contended that the present bill was, in principle, identical with that brought in last session by the late ministers, and which had been thrown out by the present government and their friends. Mr. O'Connell, on the contrary, endeavoured to show that the two measures were dissimilar. The main distinctions between the two appeared to be, that the bill of last session made the landlords a present of two-fifths of the whole tithes, or 40*l.* in every 100*l.*—secured the clergyman 77½ per cent. of his present legal income—and devolved an annual charge, equal to 17½ per cent. of the whole tithes, upon the consolidated fund; whereas it was now proposed to give the landlords only one-fourth of the whole tithes—to secure to the clergyman only 75 per cent. of his present legal income—and to devolve no charge upon the consolidated fund whatever. The present measure much more nearly resembled the shape in which the bill of the late ministers was originally brought in than that into which it was eventually transformed, on the application of the Irish landlords, and in which it was thrown out by the lords. Ministerial resolution passed by 213 to 193.

23. Lord Brougham presented a petition, numerously signed by inhabitants of the city of London, in favour of the abolition of the stamp-duty on newspapers; and in doing so, took occasion to address their lordships at considerable length, in support of the views of the petitioners. No observations upon the subject, however, were made by any of the ministers.

24. Sir R. Peel brought forward his plan for effecting a commutation of tithes in England, by voluntary agreement between the owner and payer of tithes; the payment in money in lieu of tithe to be subject to variation at stated periods, according to the prices of corn. A resolution embodying the leading principle of the plan was agreed to.

Duke of Richmond's motion for a select committee to consider the subject of prison discipline in England, agreed to.

28. Court of common council of London passed a resolution, declaring that alderman ought to be elected for seven years only instead of for life as at present.

A dinner given to lord John Russell at the Freemasons' Tavern, London. Nearly 300 members of parliament were present. Lord Morpeth, chairman; Mr. Fox Maule, lord Ebrington, the earl of Kerry, Mr. Grote, and lord Dalmeny, among the speakers.

Prince Augustus of Portugal, after being for little more than a month the husband of the young queen Donna Maria, died of a sore throat. He was only 24 years old, and was the son of Eugene Beauharnois, formerly viceroy of Italy, and step-son of Napoleon by the empress Josephine.

30. Lord John Russell, after the house had been called over, brought forward his resolution on the Irish Church,—"That the house should resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider of the temporalities of the Church of Ireland." The motion was met by sir Edward Knatchbull with a direct negative; and a debate ensued, which was continued by adjournments over the three following nights. The speakers in favour of the resolution were, Mr. Ward, lord Howick, Mr. Shiel, Mr. Charles Wood, Mr. Poulter, Mr. Feargus O'Connor, sir John Hobhouse, Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Dr. Lushington, Mr. Littleton, Mr. Spring Rice, sir John Campbell, Mr. Sergeant Wilde, Mr. Fowell Buxton, lord Clements, and Mr. O'Connell. Those on the other side were, sir James Graham, Dr. Lefroy, colonel Damer, sir Robert Inglis, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, sir William Follett, Mr. Praed, Mrs. Bielby Thompson, sir Henry Hardinge, lord Stanley, Mr. Richards, Mr. Goulbourn, Mr. Horace Twiss, Mr. Borthwick, and sir Robert Peel. At length, after lord John Russell had shortly replied, the house divided at nearly three o'clock on the morning of April 4, when the numbers were found to be, for the motion, 322; against it, 289.

Lord Elliot and Colonel Gurwood were this month sent on a mission to Spain, by the duke of Wellington, to endeavour to put a stop to the cruelties practised by the belligerents, and render the war between the Carlists and constitutionalists less bloody and revengeful. Examples of the reciprocal massacre of prisoners when the fight was over had occurred last year, and in this had occurred instances of like atrocities, both on the part of Mina and Zumalacarraguy. The Christians hesitated at first to enter into any terms with the Carlists, whom they deemed rebels, but at length it was mutually agreed upon, between General Valdez and Don Carlos, that the prisoners taken on either side were to be treated as prisoners taken in ordinary war. The stipulations were only observed a few months, when the former barbarities were again practised.

Apr. 4. Lord John Russell, in a committee on the Irish Church bill, moved,—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that any surplus which may remain after fully providing for the spiritual wants of the members of the established church of Ireland ought to be applied to the general education of all classes of Christians." Debate adjourned.

6. Debate resumed, and the resolution carried by 262 against 237.

7. Report of the committee being brought up, lord John Russell moved,—"That it is the opinion of this house that no measure upon the subject of tithes in Ireland can lead to a satisfactory and final adjustment which does not embody the principle contained in the foregoing resolution." Another long debate followed, which terminated at one o'clock in the morning, when there appeared, ayes 265, noes 258; majority against ministers, 27.

8. DISSOLUTION OF THE PEEL MINISTRY.—To-day the duke of Wellington in the upper house, and sir Robert Peel in the lower, announced their resignations in consequence of the resolution passed the preceding night. Sir Robert took his leave in a well-conceived speech, that elicited the praise of lord John Russell, and the spontaneous cheers of all parties. Though thwarted by the commons, he parted with them on good terms, and declared that, as the whole of his political life had been spent among them, the remainder of it should be spent there, and that he should always wish to stand well with the house, whether in a majority or minority. (Ann. Reg. lxxvii. 231.) His premiership had been brief, but characterised by ability, directness, and liberality. It showed that toriyism might exist in name, but that in practice it had disappeared. Abuses had ceased to be defended: economy was cultivated; inquiry into and information on all branches of the public service were readily conceded. All the ministerial plans had been framed to meet the public wants, and conciliate the public suffrages. They were mostly judicious, and satisfactory to the nation. The marriage bill satisfied the scruples of the sectaries; the Irish tithe bill was copied from that of their predecessors with amendments; and the chief defect of the bill for the commutation of English tithes was in its being voluntary in lieu of compulsory.

It was not in respect of the new practices of the torics, but their old, and as many believed innate propensities, that the commons turned round upon them. Their conversion was deemed suspicious, and suspected to be a hollow conformity to perpetuate official existence. Hence it was determined to try them, by bringing into the battle-field Mr. Ward's appropriation clause (see May 27, 1834); it was not necessary to the progress of the Irish tithe bill, and it was used merely as a test to ascertain their progress in sound doctrine. This touchstone they could not withstand; ancient sympathies revived, and they recoiled from the idea of assenting even in words to the contingency, that if the wealth of the church was found redundant, it should be applied to any other purpose, not even to the laudable one of making the superfluity of the rich subservient to the education of the poor. Finding that this alternative would be pressed upon them, and their refusal to adopt it would be made the ground of an address to the king, expressive of a want of confidence in his ministers, they resigned their places. The parliamentary session up to the present had been comparatively lost. It was evident, from the majorities against them at the commencement, that the ministry could not stand, but the opposition allowed them to describe their plans, and seemed disposed to despatch them by the established parliamentary routine, not by violence to hasten their dissolution.

9. The coffee-dealers of the metropolis represent to the Treasury the advantages of a further reduction in the duty on coffee, by tending to the increase of the revenue, to the benefit of consumers, and the prevention of adulteration with chicory and other deleterious articles.

10. Gazette announced the elevation of Alexander Baring, M. P., to the peerage, by the title of baron Ashburton.

A woman named Mary Ann Burdock was tried at Bristol for poisoning an old lady who lived with her. The trial lasted two days, and excited unusual interest. It appeared that the lady who was poisoned was possessed of a considerable sum of money, which excited the cupidity of the prisoner, who destroyed her by mixing arsenic in some gruel. This was on the 23d Oct., 1833. Circumstances having subsequently excited suspicion, the body was, fourteen months afterwards, taken out of the grave and examined, when the appearances presented led to the apprehension of the prisoner. She was executed on the 15th, and the crowd assembled on the occasion was immense.

14. The colonial office has determined on an issue of silver coins to pass current in the West Indies at 3*d.* and 1½*d.*, as well as of shillings and sixpences, to promote the success of the apprenticeship system.

18. MELBOURNE MINISTRY RESTORED.—On the resignation of sir R. Peel the king sent for earl Grey, who, whatever advice he might tender, declined the task of forming a new administration. (Ann. Reg. lxxvii. 235). The business therefore devolved on viscount Melbourne, who promptly completed his ministry out of his former materials; the chief alterations were the incorporation of lord Howick, the eldest son of earl Grey, in the cabinet, and the omission of lords Brougham and Althorp, now earl Spencer. On the premier mentioning the completion of his undertaking in the lords on the 18th, lord Alvanley asked him if he had secured the assistance of Mr. O'Connell and his friends, and, if so, on what terms? Lord Brougham protested against this interrogatory as disorderly; and lord Melbourne replied that he did not know whether or not he should have the support of Mr. O'Connell, but he had taken no measures to secure it. The following formed the new cabinet:—

Viscount Melbourne, First Lord of the Treasury.

Lord Palmerston, Foreign Secretary.

Lord John Russell, Home Secretary.

Rt. Hon. Charles Grant, Colonial Secretary.

Rt. Hon. Spring Rice, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Viscount Duncannon, Lord Privy Seal, and Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests.

Lord Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Sir John Hobhouse, President of the India Board.

Rt. Hon. C. Poulett Thomson, President of Board of Trade.

Lord Howick, Secretary at War.

Lord Holland, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The appointments not Cabinet were:—

Sir Henry Parnell, Paymaster of the Forces and Treasurer of the Navy.

Lord Morpeth, Irish Secretary.

Marquis of Conyngham, Postmaster-General.

Charles Wood, esq., Secretary to the Admiralty.

Lord Dalmeny, Admiral Adam, Admiral

Lord Seymour, W. H. Ord, and Robert

Stewart, esqrs., Lords of the Treasury.

T. Baring, and E. J. Stanley, esqrs., Joint Secretaries of the Treasury.

Robert Gordon and Vernon Smith, esqrs.
Joint Secretaries to the Board of Control.

Sir Rufane Donkin, Surveyor-General of the Ordnance.

Colonel Leith Hay, Clerk of the Ordnance.

Colonel Anson, Storekeeper of the Ordnance.

Sir George Grey, Under Secretary of the Colonies.

Lord Fordwich, Under Foreign Secretary.

Earl of Mulgrave, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Hon. Fox Maule, Under Secretary for the Home Department.

H. Labouchere, esq., Vice-President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint.

Duke of Argyll, Lord Steward.

Earl of Albemarle, Master of the Horse.

Earl of Errol, Master of the Buckhounds.

Earl of Gosford, Captain of the Yeomen Guard.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General.

R. M. Rolfe, esq., Solicitor-General.

Cutlar Fergusson, esq., Judge-Advocate.

J. A. Murray, esq., Lord Advocate for Scotland.

Mr. Cunningham, Solicitor-General for Scotland.

Lord Plunket, Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

Serjeant Perrin, Attorney-General for Ireland.

Michael O'Loughlin, esq., Solicitor-General for Ireland.

The Great Seal was reserved, and for the present put in commission. The commissioners were sir Charles Pepys, master of the rolls; sir Lancelot Shadwell, vice-chancellor; and Mr. justice Hosanquet. The change of ministers and some peerage creations caused several elections. Mr. Littleton being raised to the upper house by the title of lord Hatherton, a vacancy occurred in the county of Stafford. A conservative took the field and was returned. Mr. Charles Grant was created baron Glenelg, and the Scotch county of Inverness, which he had represented, returned a conservative. Lord John Russell was unexpectedly defeated in his re-election for South Devon. His lordship became member without opposition for Stroud, a vacancy having been made for him by the retirement of colonel Fox, who became secretary to the ordnance. By a similar negotiation, Mr. Kennedy, member for Tiverton, made room for lord Palmerston, who had lost his seat for Hampshire at the general election. In Yorkshire lord Morpeth was opposed, but carried his election by a large majority. Other ministers were re-elected without opposition. It is curious to remark, in respect of the restored ministry, the caprice of popular opinion. They were the same men, with one or two exceptions, that had become unpopular in the autumn, from the supposed want of general ability and zeal in the cause of reform. The nation now gladly witnessed their return to power as a happy escape from tory government; and they actually acquired strength, either from the increasing favour of the people, or the temporary indifference to political questions that usually follows a previous state of high excitement.

20. Commons adjourned to May 12.

At the end of the month the French chamber of deputies decided against the emancipation of the negroes, by a majority of 240 to 51! This decision is not honourable to the practical philanthropy of France. Deputies seemed willing enough to emancipate at the expense of the slaveholders, and to enjoy the honours of a vicarious generosity; but when it was suggested that a compensation, after the example of England, must be made to the planters out of the French purse, they clapped their hands on their pockets and at once refused to entertain the question.

May 1. Duel between lord Alvanley and Morgan O'Connell, M.P., which terminated without injury to either party after firing several pistols. It originated in Mr. O'Connell taking up the dispute of his father with his lordship.

5. FRENCH POLITICAL TRIALS.—These trials originated in the insurrectionary riots (see April 9, 1834) of the republicans at Paris and Lyons, and which the government had suppressed by the bayonet and grape-shot, and the apprehension of 1000 persons. The question that had latterly agitated France, had been the mode of dealing with this mass of prisoners, whether by a general amnesty or by bringing them to trial. By the French charter the king has power to transfer the trial of political offences from the ordinary tribunals by a jury to the chamber of peers. Before the peers it was determined to bring the accused, and before this tribunal the entire body had been arraigned in the past year, and 164 selected for trial, the rest being discharged. The trials commenced on the 5th inst., preparatory to which a vast military force had been silently collected in Paris and the environs.

A temporary hall of wood, which cost 14,000*l.*, had been erected, the peers' chamber being too small for the purpose. The group of prisoners when brought to the bar presented a strange appearance. Many wore cocked hats, all moustachios, several had long beards, and one was shaved, combed, and dressed, so as to present a likeness of Robespierre. They were mostly weavers, newspaper-writers, and half-pay officers. Some days elapsed before the proceedings could be seriously entered upon. The accused insisted on an unlimited right in the choice of counsel, either from the French bar or elsewhere. This overruled, they objected to the jurisdiction of the court—refused to answer interrogatories—and denied the legality of the proceedings. Many were tried in their absence, and it was not till August 17 the peers were able to give judgment against the Lyonnese section of the accused, fifty-two in number, who were sentenced to imprisonment for life, or for a term of years. While the Lyons prisoners were being disposed of, most of those of Paris, who were really the most dangerous of the two classes, had contrived, by a subterraneous passage, to escape from the prison of St. Pelagie. Further proceedings in this state prosecution, or, as the Parisians termed it, the procès-monsieur, were adjourned.

8. A deputation, headed by Dr. Birkbeck, waited upon the chancellor of the exchequer in order to lay before him statements relative to the repeal of the stamp-duty on newspapers. A long conversation ensued, chiefly upon the financial difficulties connected with the removal of the stamp-duty. The conference lasted two hours.

11. Lord Mulgrave, the new lord lieutenant of Ireland, landed at Kingston and was escorted into Dublin by a vast assemblage of the people, who went in procession to meet him.

* Dinner given to sir Robert Peel at the Merchant Tailors' Hall, at which the duke of Wellington and other public characters were present. Sir Robert Peel spoke at considerable length, and urged upon those around him the necessity of exertion in order to obtain effective influence in the house of commons, as the only check to those evils which he apprehended from the present state of things. In the forenoon a man had been brought before the lord mayor, charged with sticking up in the city the following placard:—"Poor men—take notice! A dinner to Peel will be given by the rump of the Pitt and plunder faction, assisted by the self-elected and corrupt courts of assistants of the grocers, tailors, goldsmiths, and skinner, 7 city aldermen, 7 poverty-stricken peers, 29 defeated candidates, 5 bishops, a bloated buffoon, the idiot, and a mayor, on Monday next, May 11th. The expenses to be defrayed out of the funds left for charitable purposes." The bill-sticker was ordered to find bail.

12. GERMAN COMMERCIAL LEAGUE.—Prussia, strong without, and enjoying prosperity and peace within, has almost completed her great scheme of uniting the German states in one body, so far as concerns the duties on exports and imports. The grand-duchy of Baden, whose position in regard to France rendered its accession to the system an object of much importance, had long resisted; but all difficulties were overcome, and Baden on the 12th inst. signed the mutual treaty as a member of the league. Hitherto the custom-duties had varied in each state, being higher in some and lower in others. A necessary consequence was, that each state was surrounded by its own line of custom-houses, and guarded by its own peculiar system of protective or prohibitory duties. To each, of them all the neighbouring states were foreign countries; trade was hampered, and manufactures were depressed by innumerable obstructions; and the expense of maintaining so many fiscal establishments was a heavy drawback on the revenues which they collected. Prussia had laboured for several years to unite the different members of the confederation in a treaty, which would establish one tariff for all the states, the duties to be collected on the frontier only of what would then form one commercial union, and thus relieve the industry and intercourse of the interior from interminable lines of custom-houses. One after another, Bavaria, Hesse Cassel, Wurtemberg, Hesse Darmstadt, the small states of Thuringia and Baden joined the association. Hamburgh and Frankfort next entered the union; the latter city had been kept back till it had procured the revocation of a treaty it had concluded a short time previously with England. The entire confederacy now consists of four kingdoms, three grand dukedoms, and more than twenty smaller states; the whole comprising 8654 German square miles, with 27,728,000 inhabitants. (Foreign Quarterly Review, xlv. 306.) As the inhabitants are generally industrious, and their industry being chiefly connected with agriculture, there is no natural tendency among them to vie with English manufactures; and nothing save a mistaken policy can thwart the continuance and even extension of a commercial intercourse, attended with reciprocal benefits. That this has been the result is shown by the exports of British and Irish commodities to Germany having increased since the first commencement of the league, Jan. 1, 1834. In the four preceding years the average exports amounted to 4,576,144; in the four years from 1834 to 1837 inclusive to 4,782,207.

14. At the annual meeting of the London Missionary Society, at Exeter Hall, a dexterous theft was committed. Amongst the sums collected on the occasion were a quantity of bank-notes and slips of paper, technically termed I O U's, amounting to nearly 600*l.*, which were put apart in a bag, and placed on a table behind the chairman. While the assembly were singing a doxology, the bag was stolen.

18. A corporal of the marines executed at Maidstone for the murder of a woman, whom, in a fit of drunken fury, he had stabbed with his bayonet. The jury on the trial expressed themselves in strong terms on the inexpediency of allowing soldiers not on duty to wear their side-arms.

20. At a convocation held at Oxford, it was proposed to substitute at matriculation a subscription to the following declaration instead of the usual subscription to the 39 Articles:—"I, A. B., declare that I do, so far as my knowledge extends, assent to the doctrines of the United Church of England and Ireland, as set forth in her thirty-nine articles; that I will conform to her liturgy and discipline; and that I am ready and willing to be instructed in her articles of religion, as required by the statutes of this University." On a division the numbers in favour of the alteration were 57, and against it 439.

A meeting held at the British Coffee-house, Westminster, T. W. Coke, esq., in the chair, at which it was resolved to establish a reform association, to ensure the registration of the electors of Britain, and to protect them in the independent exercise of the elective franchise. A large number of names of noblemen and gentlemen appear in the published list of the committee; and G. Grote, M.P., is appointed treasurer of the association. A similar union, the Carlton Club, had been set on foot by the conservatives.

21. At a meeting of the Pitt club, held in Edinburgh, it was, on the motion of lord Meadowbank, resolved to appropriate 1000*l.* sterling for the establishment, in the university of Edinburgh, of a prize to be given annually to the most deserving of the students attending the Divinity Hall, and which should be termed and known by the name of the Pitt prize.

In the upper house, lord Brougham, after entering into the subject of education generally, proposed fourteen resolutions, embodying the leading principles of his plan for the improvement of national education. He expressed himself opposed to the government undertaking the establishment of a general system of schools, on the ground that such an interference would in all probability check the exertions of private individuals, by means of which he contended that the want of common schools was already in the course of being supplied. He admitted, however, the inferior quality of the education dispensed at such schools, and, to remedy that evil, proposed that normal schools, or schools for the education of teachers, should be instituted and supported from the public funds. Lord Melbourne undertook, on the part of ministers, that the subject should receive the closest and most anxious consideration.

The commons early adjourned, owing to a singular mistake—the name of a member of the house, which had been twice called and supposed to have been answered by the individual as being present, having been inserted in a ballot on an election petition, when the fact was that he had not been present at all. This informality caused an adjournment.

27. At the close of the contested election for South Staffordshire, arising out of the elevation of Mr. Littleton to the peerage, and said to be the only contested election which has occurred there for the last 85 years, a disturbance took place at Wolverhampton, which led to the reading of the riot act and the intervention of the military.

June 1. King Otho having attained his majority, the regency placed the reins of government in his hands. Prior to the landing of the prince at the Piræus, the seat of the Greek government had been transferred from Nauplia to Athens.

4. Anniversary of the charitable schools of the metropolis in St. Paul's cathedral. Among the audience was prince Jameh-ood-deen, a son of Tippoo Saib, and one of the hostages given to lord Cornwallis in 1792, who is at present on a visit to this country.

5. REFORM OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—To-day lord John Russell introduced the important subject of a reform of the municipalities of England and Wales, and which had been looked forward to with great interest and a considerable degree of impatience by the community. The abuses existing in municipal corporations had for more than two centuries been a matter of constant and nearly universal complaint. Any general remedy, however, was impracticable, while abuses in the representation of the people in parliament were to be maintained. The venal boroughs, of which the franchise was abolished or amended by the Reform Act, were the chief seats of corporation abuse; and the correction of the local evil would have been the virtual destruction of the system by which the aristocracy retained its political ascendancy. Every borough having the privilege of returning a member to parliament, was indispensable either to the whig or tory party; and in these boroughs the greatest abuses naturally prevailed, because impunity in the neglect of duty, and in the misapplication of the municipal funds, was the cheapest bribe by which the suffrages of the corporators could be purchased. Impunity being thus secured in the parliamentary boroughs, it would have been too trying an experiment on the patience of the people to have undertaken to reform the comparatively insignificant abuses of the non-parliamentary boroughs. The greater abuse thus served to shelter the less; but its chief value was destroyed by parliamentary reform; and moreover, having extended to the people the right of choosing the members of the legislature, the inferior right of choosing their own local authorities could not consistently be withheld. The boroughs of Scotland had, as already stated, (p. 938,) undergone a system of purification by vesting the election of the magistrates and town-councils in the ten-pound householders. In England it was thought advisable to proceed by issuing, in 1833, a commission under the great seal, consisting of twenty gentlemen, to inquire into the state of municipal corporations, their modes of administering justice, their revenues and funds, and the privileges of freemen and other members thereof. The number of places in which the inquiries under the commission were carried on was 237, having a population of 2,028,513. In twenty-five places the number of corporators not ascertained; in the others (212) they amount to 88,509. The governing body is self-elected in 186 boroughs. This body elects the mayor in 131 boroughs, appoints the recorder in 136, and the town clerk in 135. The number of corporators exercising magisterial functions is 1086 in 186 boroughs. In 112 boroughs the corporation has exclusive criminal jurisdiction extending to the trial of various descriptions of offences; and in forty-two their jurisdiction is not exclusive. Seventeen boroughs do not enjoy any income whatever; in eight the precise amount could not be obtained. The total income of 212 boroughs amounts to 366,948*l.*; their expenditure to 377,027*l.*: 103 are involved in debts amounting to 1,855,371*l.*, and are besides burdened with annuities amounting to 4463*l.* In twenty-eight boroughs only are the accounts published; in fifteen the annual income is under 20*l.*; in eleven it is between 200*l.* and 3000*l.*; in five, 3000*l.* and under 4000*l.*; in one, 4000*l.* and under 5000*l.*; in four, 5000*l.* and under 7500*l.*; in five, 10,000*l.* and under 12,500*l.*; in one, 12,500*l.* and under 15,000*l.*; in one, 15,000*l.* and under 20,000*l.*; in one, 33,000*l.*, and in one, 91,000*l.* In closing their general report on the corporations, the commissioners say:—"Even where these institutions exist in their least imperfect form, and are most rightfully administered, they are inadequate to the wants of the present state of society. In their actual condition, where not productive of positive evil, they exist, in the great majority of instances, for no purpose of general utility. The perversion of municipal institutions to political ends has occasioned the sacrifice of local interests to party purposes, which have been frequently pursued through the corruption and demoralization of the electoral bodies.

"In conclusion, we report to your Majesty that there prevails amongst the inhabitants of a great majority of the incorporated towns a general, and, in our opinion, a just dissatisfaction with their municipal institutions; a distrust of the self-elected municipal councils, whose powers are subject to no popular control, and whose acts and proceedings being secret, are unchecked by the influence of public opinion; a distrust of the municipal magistracy, tainting with suspicion the local administration of justice, and often accompanied with contempt of the persons by whom the law is administered; a discontent under the burdens of local taxation, while revenues that ought to be applied for the public advantage are diverted from their legitimate use, and are sometimes wastefully bestowed for the benefit of individuals, sometimes squandered for purposes injurious to the character and morals of the people. We therefore feel it to be our duty to represent to your Majesty that the existing municipal corporations of England and Wales neither possess nor deserve the confidence or respect of your Majesty's subjects, and that a thorough reform must be effected, before they can become what we humbly submit to your Majesty they ought to be, useful and efficient instruments of local government." Upon these representations, and the mass of evils disclosed by the commissioners in their voluminous returns, lord John Russell founded his bill of municipal regulation. It was elaborately discussed in both houses, and did not pass through its several stages until the end of the session. In the lords it was sharply scrutinized; various amendments were there introduced, which a majority of the commons did not consider improvements. In some of these amendments they refused to concur; on others conferences were held with the upper house; and in others, where agreement or compromise was unattainable, the noble mover recommended that the commons should acquiesce rather than lose the bill altogether; for, "though deprived of much of its original excellence, it was still an effective reform of municipal institutions." As first introduced, the bill extended to 183 boroughs, including a population of about two millions. Five boroughs were cut off from its operation. To 128 of the more important boroughs a commission of the peace is assigned, while to the remaining 50 a commission will only be granted on application to the crown. Many boroughs, on account of their insignificance, are excluded from the act. London, with its numerous and wealthy incorporated guilds, is reserved for future legislation. The grand feature of the municipal bill is that it vests the local government of a town in the rated and permanently resident inhabitants. "Every male person of full age who, on the last day of August in any year, shall have occupied premises within the borough continuously for the three previous years, and shall for that time have been an inhabitant householder within seven miles of the borough, provided that he shall have been rated to the poor-rates, and shall have paid them and all borough rates during the time of his occupation," is qualified to vote for the town-council. In the council is vested the entire deliberative and administrative functions of the corporation. They appoint the town-clerk and treasurer, and from them the mayor and aldermen are chosen. They have the control of the police, watching, and lighting; they may make bye-laws, and impose fines for their non-observance, for the prevention of nuisances, and the due government of the borough. They have the control of the burgess fund: if there be a surplus, after defraying all necessary expenses, they may apply it to local improvements or any object beneficial to the inhabitants; or, if the fund be insufficient, they may order a rate, of the nature of a county rate, to be levied. They have also a power, if they think it requisite that one or more salaried police magistrates should be appointed, to fix the amount of such magistrates' salaries, and, upon their application, the crown is empowered to appoint the number of magistrates required. To prevent fraud, jobbing, and waste in the management of the burgess revenue, provision is made for the periodical auditing of accounts, and their subsequent publication. The burgesses yearly appoint the auditors, who must be persons qualified to be councillors, but not actually of that body, lest identity of interest might lead to partiality in the exercise of their function. The qualification of a councillor is a property qualification, varying with the amount of population. In boroughs divided into four or more wards, a real or personal estate of 1000*l.*, or being rated to the poor upon the annual value of at least 30*l.*; in other boroughs a moiety of this qualification suffices. The qualification clause was one of the questionable amendments introduced by the lords, as well as that appointing aldermen, an order having precedence merely and no duties distinct from those of councillors; and who appear to have been created either out of a veneration for ancient names and degrees, or from a desire to preserve in the new municipalities a miniature representation of the imperial government of three estates—king, lords, and commons. All the existing rights of freedom, or citizenship, or burgess-ship, in the old corporations, are preserved to the present possessors. This was just; as many of these immunities consisted of an interest in charities, lands, or exemption from tolls, which had been purchased by money or services, or acquired by lawful inheritance. But all exclusive privileges of trading, or of exercising any calling or handicraft, in corporate towns are abolished. As the act was framed for the reform of existing municipal corporations, it does not apply to the unincorporated towns. But on the petition of the inhabitant householders of any town not corporate, the crown is empowered to extend the provisions of this important statute by the grant of charters of incorporation.

June 5. A bill for establishing a metropolitan water company, which was to obtain supplies of soft water by means of Artesian wells, was rejected in the commons, by 134 to 60.

At the Kent special sessions, the grand jury found a true bill against 18 persons, most of whom were labourers, for being concerned in riots which took place on the introduction of the new poor law bill into that district, and the consequent change of system. On their trials they were all found guilty, but were recommended to mercy.

9. An order in council appeared in the Gazette, suspending the Foreign Enlistment Bill in favour of the queen of Spain, and permitting recruits and supplies to be raised in this country for her service. Colonel De Lacy Evans, one of the members for Westminster, was appointed by the Spanish authorities to the command of a British auxiliary legion, raised for that purpose. When a battalion of these troops had landed at St. Sebastian, July 10, Don Carlos issued a proclamation, threatening to shoot all "strangers" taken prisoners.

16. Zumalacarreguy, the commander-in-chief of the troops of Don Carlos, and a brave and active officer, mortally wounded near Bilbao. He was the modern Montrose of Spain, and the chief support of the Carlist cause. Almost immediately after his death the Carlists raised the siege of Bilbao, and retired dispirited. He was succeeded in command by Moreno, a well-known but inferior man, who presided at the execution of General Torrijos and Mr. Boyd.

17. The forty-seventh anniversary of the Literary Fund celebrated at the Freemasons' Hall. On the health of Azmi Bey, the patron of the Lancasterian system in Persia, being drunk, the compliment was acknowledged by him through his interpreter, who stated that full 10,000 children were receiving instruction under the Lancasterian system in Persia.

18. An explosion took place at one of Mr. Russell's mines at Wallsend, about four miles from Newcastle. Upwards of an hundred individuals, most of them young men and boys, lost their lives by this melancholy occurrence.

18. DEATH OF WILLIAM COBBETT, M. P.—This remarkable public character, after a bustling and varied life, expired on Normandy Farm, seven miles from Farnham, his native place. The late hours of the house of commons, and the change of habits imposed upon him by his entrance at an advanced age into parliament, may have hastened his death a few years. He survived, however, beyond the average term of human existence. According to his own reckoning he was born in 1766; according to his baptismal register, which is the safer authority, he was born in 1762. He was the third of four sons of a small farmer, and publican at Farnham, who occupied a house still standing beside the river Wey, which has been known for eighty years past as "The Jolly Farmer." His father was a just man, who, to the extent of his means and ability, did his duty to his children. On the winter evenings he taught his boys to read, write, and cipher; grammar he did not understand, but he made them get the rules by heart, which, though of little advantage unaccompanied with a verbal elucidation of principles, is usually as much as is done for pupils in the ordinary routine of school instruction. William Cobbett had thus the benefit of a good parental example, and, furnished with the chief instruments of knowledge, his future acquirements depended on native talent, inclination, and industry, in none of which he was deficient. Arrived at manhood and desirous of another occupation than husbandry, he became clerk to a London attorney, from the secluded drudgery of whose employment he speedily escaped by enlisting for a soldier. He was eight years in the army, and, by his correct conduct and superior merit, rapidly passed through every rank from that of private to sergeant-major. He devoted the leisure afforded by a soldier's life to reading and intellectual improvement. After obtaining his discharge, he accused some of his late officers of embezzlement in the regimental accounts; a court-martial was granted at his earnest solicitation: he allowed the court to assemble, and the witnesses on both sides, but, instead of appearing to substantiate his charges, he privately, along with his newly-married wife, withdrew to France. (Westminster Review, lvi. 455.) Here he spent six months, the happiest, he used to say, he ever spent in his life. He next went over to New York, and sought, through the means of Mr. Jefferson, employment under the American government. Failing in this application, he commenced giving lessons in the English and French languages, and, in addition, became an author and bookseller. This was about the year 1794.

As public writer Cobbett found his congenial element, and, under the nom de guerre he had assumed of "Peter Porcupine," shot his quills in all directions. The French revolutionists, the founders of American independence, the English reformers, and the friends of liberty of every clime, became the unsparing objects of his literary vengeance. His boldness, sagacity, violent abuse, and powers of ridicule and argument, soon attracted notice. But his popularity was short-lived. Exaggeration and audacious virulence, which were his favourite weapons, may conduce to transitory notoriety, but can never long sustain an author in public estimation. He returned to England in 1800; a step hastened, if not rendered unavoidable, by loss of reputation, and the results of several prosecutions for libel instituted against him in the American courts. The fame of his writings had preceded him, and his arrival was welcomed by John Reeves, Mr. Gifford, the police-justice, and other active anti-jacobins, with whom he had corresponded while in the United States. On consulting Mr. Reeves about the state of opinion in London, Reeves told him, as Cobbett used to relate, that there were only two ways of proceeding in this country, either "To kiss or kick," and he must make his election. The eccentric Mr. Windham was one of his warmest admirers; declaring in parliament that the anti-revolutionary writings of Cobbett in America had been so meritorious, that the author deserved "a statue of gold." Under the auspices of these gentlemen, he started a daily paper. During the war, government often lent its aid for the support and establishment of journals in its interest, and Mr. Cobbett is understood to have received 3000 guineas from the Treasury, to assist in carrying on his Porcupine Gazette. His speculation, however, failed, chiefly from mismanagement, the proprietor begrudging the expense necessary to procure the ordinary articles of newspaper intelligence. The paper, which for these reasons had declined in sale, received its death-blow, when, at the peace of Amiens, to which Cobbett was opposed, on his refusing to illuminate his office, the populace broke his windows. In retaliation, he published no paper next day, and when he was again pleased to publish the public would not buy. He was not more successful in the bookselling business, which he also attempted in Pall Mall, under the orthodox emblem of the "Bible and Crown." Mr. Cobbett was never successful in journalism, the chief reason of which appears to have been that he was more of a commentator on, than a promulgator of, news and occurrences. Hence, the "Weekly Register," which he established after the abandonment of his daily paper, was the sort of publication best suited to his political dissertations. This remarkable depository of the politics of the day, and of the editor's party sentiments, he carried on with untiring energy and singular versatility of talent up to the period of his death. No occurrence interrupted its publication; neither his business as a large farmer in Hampshire, nor his tours in England and Scotland: his "long arm," as he told his readers, even reached across the Atlantic, and the Register, for almost forty years, was punctual in its hebdomadal appearance, dated from Botley, Barn Elms, New York, or Rhode Island. Contemporary with the Register, he was occupied in various other works, the History and Debates of Parliament, and at a later period in the composition of grammars, histories, travels, and books on gardening and rural affairs. He was very industrious, and, his habits being temperate and regular, he was always fit for his daily task without waste of time. The early volumes of the Register, especially those from about 1803 to 1809, appear to have been carefully conducted; are distinguished by their admirable English composition, cogent reasoning, great novelty of remark and illustration, and are less virulent in style, and more correct in the detail of facts than his earlier or later writings. The sale of the Register, December 31st, 1803, amounted to 4000, which was a great number for the period; and it was circulated at a high price, chiefly among official people and the rich, whose aristocracy he fiercely and uncompromisingly represented. He was, however, quite a girouette in politics, blowing his conch at intervals from every point of the political compass. From 1794 to 1803 he was an intolerant anti-Jacobin, and the panegyrist of Mr. Pitt. In the short interval from 1803 to 1805 he inclined towards the opposition; denounced the Addington ministry because of its pacific policy, and its consisting of men not belonging to the great families; and exerted himself, in conjunction with Mr. Perry, to bring the whigs into power to accomplish a moderate reform in the house of commons. Disgusted with the whigs, when in office, who, he thought, were no better than the Tories, from 1805 to 1817 he sided with Sir F. Burdett and the Westminster electors, who repudiated both the aristocratical parties. About 1818 he sank into a lower deep; became a republican and a universal suffrage man, and the reviler of all his former principles and associates. From this extreme depression he seemed to be recovering before his death; manifested a favourable disposition towards Sir Robert Peel and the Tories; but such transitions of sentiment had rendered his co-operation of little value to any party. There were, however, two subjects on which he was generally consistent—he always opposed the funding system and the moneyed interest connected with it; and he was also steadily inimical to the education of the people above the practical knowledge appertaining to their probable condition in life. Although it was in writing that Mr. Cobbett chiefly excelled, he attained to considerable proficiency as a public speaker; and this, like his other acquirements, was the result of his own efforts. His first attempt, however, was a failure. Lord Brougham, who appears to have been present, thus describes his two appearances, in 1810 and 1820, in a court of justice, in trials for libels:—"He defended himself, and, appearing there, for the first time, before a public audience, exhibited a new but by no means a rare example of the difference between writing and speaking; for nothing could be more dull and unimpressive than his speech, nothing less clear and distinct than its reasoning, more feeble than its style, or more embarrassed and inefficient than its delivery. But he afterwards defended himself, in 1820, against actions brought by private parties whom he had slandered, and then, having by practice in the interval acquired considerable ease in speaking, his appearance was more than respectable—it was very effective. His style was also abundantly characteristic and racy, it had great originality, it suited the man, it possessed nearly all the merit of his written productions, and was set off by a kind of good, easy, comic delivery, with no little archness of both look and face, that made it clear he was calculated to tell with a popular assembly."—(Lord Brougham's Speeches, i. 6.) He became an amusing public lecturer too: the writer remembers being present at one of his exhibitions in the late Surrey Institution, when he gave imitations of lord John Russell, Mr. Brougham, lords Holland and Lansdowne, and other public men, mimicking their tones and gestures, and the supposed evasive arguments they would resort to in the approaching parliamentary session (1830) for postponing reform, which kept his auditors very merry, eliciting roars of laughter.

Although Mr. Cobbett did not enter the house of commons till after the reform bill, he did not fail in that arduous theatre; he was neither obtrusive nor diffident; a frequent and rarely an unsuccessful speaker. Taking him in the two relations of life—active and speculative—owing everything to his own spontaneous exertions, the late Mr. P. for Oldham was unquestionably one of the most remarkable men of his time. He never became a learned man, he was not deeply versed in any branch of knowledge, not even political economy, though a science intimately connected with the subjects of his weekly lucubrations; he neither treated nor understood questions scientifically, and always affected great contempt for "feelosophy;" but his superficiality was, perhaps, more available to his purpose, and certainly had a more marketable value than deep abstractions. In the politics and common affairs of life he was a proficient; possessed an unerring sagacity in detecting the real from the apparent in both men and measures; and his squandering glances at current imposture were often as serviceable to the community as mortifying to those who sought to profit by them. At the same time, he could himself act as well as detect the Scapin tricks of others: he could fill the trough as dexterously as any of his contemporaries, to attract either the herd of democracy or aristocracy. His bringing over from America, (whether he had been driven, as he told his readers, to escape the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, but, according to another version, to escape from his creditors,) the bones of Thomas Paine, as relics, upon which to raise money; his scheme for destroying the credit of the Bank of England by the nocturnal sowing of the streets with forged notes; and his various devices for getting into parliament by public subscriptions, are instances of his audacious raids on public credulity. He was uncommonly clever it must be allowed, but mere cleverness, unaccompanied with the steady pursuit of noble and virtuous ends, can never constitute a great character. Ability without service to mankind is no more valid a passport to the Pantheon than to the Newgate Calendar. By his strange inconsistencies, Mr. Cobbett and the world were quits at parting; for his utterings on both sides having been nearly equal in zeal and quantity, they did not turn the scale either way, gave to neither a preponderance. His mind had little depth, and no powers of generalization: it was of a legal cast, and his pleadings on public questions were like those of a lawyer who feels bound to utter for his client whatsoever may serve him, without regard to right or wrong, truth or falsehood. The manner, rather than the matter, of his writings, constituted their attraction. He promulgated no new truths, made no new discoveries. But his lucid diction, logical arrangement, graphic stories, jocularity, heartiness of abuse, and semblance of honesty, zeal, and independence, fascinated his readers. Diverted of the dross which his violence, dogmatism, and devouring egotism encumbered them, they possess rare and almost unequalled merits. He is always spirited, never vapid or desponding; his humour is rich, glowing, and risible in the extreme: his descriptions of scenes in which he took a part, especially those at public meetings, and of natural scenery, are the best in the language. In spite of his vacillations and imprudences, he always kept a strong hold on public opinion, and continued during almost half a century to interest a numerous class of readers, which, more than anything, proves his extraordinary and versatile powers as a writer. Some allowances must be made for the disadvantages of his personal history. His instincts were probably good, but perverted by unfavourable circumstances. The country alehouse, the attorney's office, the barrack room, and unceasing strife of politics, were better schools for sharpening the intellect than ethical discipline. Owing everything to himself; having trampled by steady perseverance over the drawbacks of humble parentage and education, it is not surprising, though much to be regretted, that his success was alloyed by arrogance, vanity, changeableness, and self-will. He had, however, extenuating excellences. He was independent in his course—too much so perhaps—and seldom truckled to any man or party. He was not selfish, at least, in a sordid sense. His love of money was always subordinate to his love of notoriety. His aims too were superior. He was no trifter, who dawdled away existence in low and frivolous pursuits. Reforns in public institutions, or improvements in agriculture, were the staple objects to which he was devoted. He always reverted to the scenes of infancy with delight. This and his attachment to a country life showed that a long communion with the world had failed to alienate his affections from the simplicity of nature.

30. RUSSIAN INFLUENCE IN TURKEY.—Both England and France were made practically to feel the influence Russia had acquired over the Porte, by the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, (see July 8, 1833). By the treaty concluded between Turkey and Britain in 1809, English ships of war were to be allowed to pass the Hellespont only on condition of landing their guns at the Dardanelles. But in the same treaty it was stipulated that England should enjoy every right and privilege allowed "to the most favoured nations in amity with the Porte." By the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, the Porte agreed to allow to Russian ships free egress from, and ingress into, the Black Sea. It followed, that England could claim the same right of access to the Black Sea, without a new convention to that effect. The case, of France stood precisely on the same ground, and both parties determined to ascertain whether Russia, by her secret treaty, had acquired privileges to which they were not admissible. Accordingly the French Government in the month of June, applied to the Porte for a passage for a sloop of war to convey M. Texier, who was desirous of pursuing his archaeological researches along the shores of the Black Sea. The reis effendi replied that it was impossible to comply with the request, the Porte being bound by treaty to refuse entrance into the Black Sea to the ships of every nation, excepting those of her ally Russia. England applying about the same time for the passage of a government steamer to convey Mr. Ellis, the new ambassador, to Persia, and his suite, to proceed through the Dardanelles to Trebizond, Russia interfered because the vessel was armed, and permission was refused on the same pretext on which it had been refused to France. Shortly afterwards the earl of Durham proceeded from England as ambassador to St. Petersburg. He took the route of Constantinople and Odessa. He arrived in the Dardanelles in the Barham, but was transferred with his suite from the Barham into an unarmed vessel.

27. The late Mr. Cobbett buried in the churchyard of Farnham, in Surrey, his native town. The funeral was attended by Messrs. O'Connell, Wakley, Fielden, and a number of other gentlemen. The mortal remains of this extraordinary man, after his long and busy life, rest with those of his humble ancestors. Many thousand persons witnessed the ceremony.

28. Charles Mathews, so justly celebrated in the theatrical world, for the exquisite life and humour of his delineations of character and manners, died at Devonport in his 60th year, after a lingering illness. He was the son of a respectable bookseller in the Strand, a Wesleyan Methodist, who, discovering the irresistible propensity of young Mathews, thus addressed him:—"Charles, there are your indentures, and also 20 guineas; I do not approve of the stage, but I will not oppose your wishes. At any time hereafter, should you feel inclined to turn to an honest calling, there are 20 guineas more, if you send for them, and your father's house is open to you." The second 20 guineas Mathews never claimed. His mono-dramatic entertainments, his "Mail Coach Adventures," his "At Home," and "Trip to America," were a source of infinite amusement during many seasons.

29. Serious disturbances occurred at Great Bircham, in Norfolk, owing to the execution of that part of the poor law amendment bill, which enacts that relief shall be given in kind instead of in money. The peasantry rose in a body against the parish officers, refused to work for the farmers, and assaulted two men who were willing to work. The house of the principal farmer of the parish was attacked and set on fire; but, on the military being called out, the riot was suppressed without bloodshed.

July 1. The sale of a large portion of monastic and other ecclesiastical property ordered to be sold by the Portuguese government began. An apprehension was felt that there might be a difficulty in finding purchasers, but the property sold readily enough. Many foreigners were among the buyers.

8. At a levee, sir F. Shuckburgh, chairman of a committee of Baronets, presented to his majesty two petitions from certain of the baronets of England, of Scotland, of Ireland, and of the United Kingdom, and their eldest sons, praying a restoration of various privileges originally belonging to the order, but stated to have been in abeyance since the Restoration.

9. The eighth vessel which has been taken up by government, under the management of the Emigration Committee, for the conveyance of females to New South Wales, sailed from the Thames. The number sent out in this instance was 160 single females, and about 40 other persons, chiefly agriculturists, and their families.

21. In going into committee on the Irish Church Bill, sir R. Peel moved, that it be divided into two portions, forming separate bills of the tithe adjustment and appropriation clauses. The proposal was debated three nights, when there appeared for preserving the bill entire, 319; for sir Robert's motion, 282.

21. The duke of Palmella intimated to the British ambassador, that the Portuguese government had determined, under the powers reserved in the treaty of 1810, to declare the Methuen treaty at an end after Jan., 1836. This treaty, altered in some particulars, but continued in its principal provisions, had long regulated the commercial intercourse between Britain and Portugal, and gave, or was supposed to give, peculiar advantages to this country. We had, however, set the first example of departing from its exclusive and in fact impolitic principles, by equalizing the duties on foreign wines, and admitting the wines of France on the same terms as those of Portugal.

24. The "Earl Grey" steam-packet from Rothesay to Glasgow, having stopped at Greenock to disembark passengers and receive others, just as she was about to depart the boiler exploded. Thirty-six persons and upwards were killed and injured.

28. ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF LOUIS PHILIP.—During the festivities of the annual commemoration of the revolution of 1830, the French king narrowly escaped assassination. It was the second day of the rejoicings, and appointed for a military review. As Louis Philip was riding along the line of the national guard, on the boulevard du Temple, accompanied by his three sons and a splendid suite, an explosion, like a discharge of musquetry, took place from the window of an adjoining house. The effect was terrific. Marshal Mortier, general de Virigny, several grenadiers, beside lookers-on, among whom was a child, were shot dead upon the spot, some of them having received two or three bullets. Upwards of forty were killed and wounded, of whom fourteen were killed. Yet the object of this indiscriminate slaughter escaped—the king was unhurt. The police, guided by the smoke, rushed into the house whence the explosion proceeded. They seized the assassin, covered with blood, in the act of letting himself down by a rope from the back window of the apartment. He was himself severely wounded, by the bursting of some of the barrels of his "infernal machine;" and his wounds had delayed his escape. The machine consisted of 25 barrels, arranged horizontally side by side, upon a frame, the back part of which could be raised or lowered according to the angle requisite to reach and sweep the space below. Each barrel was loaded with deadly missiles; the touchholes communicated by means of a train of gunpowder, and the lighting of one simultaneously discharged them all. The window, at a little distance from which the machine was placed, stood open, but the machine itself had been screened from observation by Persian blinds, which were not withdrawn till the instant of explosion. It was conjectured that the time required to open the blinds had not been calculated, which omission saved the king, for the discharge took place immediately behind him, one of the bullets wounding his horse. The assassin turned out to be a Corsican named Fieschi, who had gone through many disreputable vicissitudes,—had been a soldier—stood in the pillory for forgery—suffered two years' imprisonment for theft—and had been a spy of the police. He made no attempt to deny his guilt; he acknowledged no motive except dislike of the king. His trial showed that two persons as obscure as himself had been privy to his enterprise, but not the slightest thread of connexion could be traced between the desperado and any formidable conspiracy or political party. A momentary stupor followed the explosion, but, as soon as it was known that neither the king nor the princes were hurt, it gave place to tumultuous expressions of joy, mingled with rage against the author of the crime. The forms of the review were gone through by the king, but the rejoicings of the revolutionary anniversary were suspended; the tri-coloured flag was veiled in crape; the victims of the massacre were buried with the honours of a public funeral, which the king and his family attended, and pensions were voted by the chambers to the poor persons who had been wounded, and the relatives of those who had been killed.

30. Sir Charles Wetherell addressed the house of lords for three hours, objecting to the principle and provisions of the Corporation Reform Bill, and also to the report of the commissioners on which the bill was founded. He resumed his address on the following day, and was seconded by a two days' speech from Mr. Knight. After they had concluded, lord Melbourne, in answer to the duke of Newcastle, intimated that he would object to hear evidence in support of the arguments of counsel. The duke then remonstrated, threatening to impeach the prime minister; upon which he was reminded that an impeachment could only originate in the commons. Ultimately the lords determined to hear evidence, but the witnesses being chiefly interested parties, town-clerks, and others connected with corporations, the house, Aug. 8, came to an arrangement by which their examinations were concluded.

Aug. 4. A warm debate in the commons on Mr. Hume moving eleven resolutions condemnatory of the introduction of Orange lodges into the army, and of the alleged conduct of the duke of Cumberland in having, on various occasions, in his capacity of grand-master, issued warrants for the formation of such lodges. Discussion resumed on the 11th, and a committee appointed to inquire into the Orange lodges of England.

VIOLATIONS OF THE FRENCH CHARTER.

—The French ministry seized the opportunity afforded by the crime of Fieschi to strengthen the executive power. Although it was soon ascertained that the assassin was unconnected with any political confederacy, the alarm and horror his atrocious attempt occasioned afforded, like the treasonable attack on the person of George III. in 1796, a convenient and plausible pretext for destroying the valuable safeguards of popular liberty. On the 4th the subject was introduced to the chamber of deputies by the president of the council, the duke de Broglie. He said that France, during the last five years, had enjoyed the utmost prosperity in a state of constant alarm and disquietude. Factions, though subdued, still existed in secret; each day disclosed the evil worked by them and the disastrous traces of their passage. An inveterate hatred of the existing order, a determination to overthrow it at any sacrifice, were still to be found in the ranks of a minority which, though vanquished, was not submissive. Respect for the laws was undermined, the character of the sovereign of their choice was unceasingly assailed, his life was hourly threatened, and society since 1830, in the entire absence of all foreign danger and menace, had exhibited nothing more than a protracted revolutionary crisis. For meeting these calamities the minister proposed a series of severe and arbitrary laws for the prevention and punishment of state crimes and attempts at revolution. The first of these laws was directed wholly against the press, of the dangerous fanaticism and profound immorality of which the duke complained in strong terms, though he did not expressly identify any part of the press with Fieschi's attempt. M. Persil, the minister of justice, went farther than the duke and frankly avowed that the government was resolved that neither a republican nor Carlist press should exist, for the existence of such a press was incompatible with the very principle of the government. Three bills were introduced, and the following are the important clauses of that directed against the press, and which at once annihilates all free printing:—Art. 1. Any one found guilty of an offence against the person of the king, by any mode of publication whatever, to be punished with imprisonment and fine of from 400*l.* to 2000*l.* 2. For ridiculing the person or authority of the king, from six months to five years in prison—fine 20*l.* to 400*l.* The offender moreover to be deprived of the whole or part of the civil rights mentioned in article 42 of the penal code, for the entire duration of his penalty, and for a term equal to that of the imprisonment to which he may have been condemned. The rights hereby suspended are the rights of electing or being elected, the right of holding any public or administrative office, of serving as a jurymen, of giving evidence in a court of justice, of acting as tutor or curator to minors. 3. For mentioning or even alluding to the name of the king in any disquisition upon the acts of government, imprisonment from one month to a year, and a fine of from 20*l.* to 200*l.* 4. To reflect in writing upon the form and principle of the king's government, or to put forth any direct or indirect provocation to change them, is high treason, to be punished by detention (unlimited) and fine of from 400*l.* to 2000*l.* 5. Whosoever shall publicly avow himself a republican, or suggest a wish, hope, or threat, that the government ought to assume that form, to be imprisoned from six months to five years, and fined from 20*l.* to 400*l.* 6. Similar denunciations against all who profess themselves Carlists. 7. A journal convicted twice to be fined doubly, and even four times the amount for every succeeding offence. 8. Any editor opening subscriptions to pay off a fine, to be imprisoned for that offence from one month to one year, and fined from 20*l.* to 200*l.* 9. Forbids publishing the names of jurors, either before or after political trials. 10. Every gerant, or responsible editor, must sign each number of his paper. 11. Refusing to insert government contradictions of statements (being previously paid)—imprisonment one month to a year, and fine from 20*l.* to 200*l.* 12. Refusing to disclose the name of the author of any inculpated article, imprisonment for that offence alone, from a month to a year, and fine from 40*l.* to 200*l.* 14. No engraving, drawing, lithographic print, or emblem of any description, to be published, exposed, or sold, without the licence, in Paris, of the minister of the interior, and in the departments of the prefect—fine from 4*l.* to 40*l.* and imprisonment. 15th and 16th Articles prohibit, under like punishments, the establishment of a theatre, or the performance of any theatrical piece, without licence from the same authorities. Such are the main enactments of this French gagging bill. There are 21 more articles, chiefly of a technical nature, but some of them are devised to give the law-officers of the crown an advantage over the defendant, and narrow the right of appeal to the Court of Cassation. The second bill attacks trial by jury. By the existing law, a verdict of guilty could not be returned, unless two-thirds of the jury, eight out of twelve, concurred in it. The new bill provides that an absolute majority, seven to five, is sufficient, and, to protect the jurors from popular influence, allows them to vote by ballot. The same bill gives an arbitrary power of imprisonment in any place not in the continental territory of the kingdom; under which a Parisian editor might be punished with incarceration in a French West India island, or in a dungeon on the coast of Africa. The third bill makes alterations in the proceedings of the courts of assize. It empowers the minister of justice to form as many of them as may be necessary for proceeding simultaneously against accused parties, and is equivalent to our special commission issued in public emergencies. It also prescribes the course to be adopted by the tribunals in the treatment of contumacious prisoners who refuse to plead, misconduct themselves, or insult the court, as in the recent political trials (May 5). These tremendous bills met with a warm, but not successful, opposition in either chamber. The first bill, carried by a majority, in the deputies, of 224 to 129, was that relating to jury-trial. Its chief opponent was M. Arago, the mathematician, who tried to demonstrate arithmetically that there was less liability of error when unanimity or a large majority was essential to a criminal verdict. He argued thus:—"The judgment of man is but a probability, and probabilities are determined by number. If a verdict is resolved upon by ten men out of twelve, there is a greater probability that it will be a just verdict than if it had been pronounced by seven in twelve. The degree of certainty in a judgment is in direct proportion to the number of judges who have delivered it." The mode of secret voting was left to be regulated by a royal ordinance. The assize bill was carried by a still larger majority than the jury bill. The bill against the liberty of the press was most pertinaciously resisted, and M.M. Dupin and Royer Collard—the last, considered the father of the doctrinaire ministry, by whom it had been introduced—strenuously condemned some of its clauses. "That rendering offences of the press, like offences against the state, cognizable by the chamber of peers—itself, a one-sided political tribunal—was eloquently, but unavailingly, denounced. In one respect, the press bill was made more severe. Under the existing law, the cautionary deposit from a daily newspaper, published in Paris, is 2000*l*. This was raised to 4000*l*., with reductions to the provincial journals proportioned to their distance from the capital; and an amount of security was required, to meet costs and damages in prosecutions, not easily obtained by literary or political speculators in France. All the new laws had passed through their different stages early in September. The press bill was carried in the peers on the 9th, as brought from the deputies, by a majority of 101 to 20. On the 11th the chambers were prorogued, and, as a suitable auxiliary to their proceedings, there appeared at the same time a royal ordinance, creating thirty new peers, all of them, with hardly an exception, dependant on the government. The destruction of the constitutional charter, which Charles X. was hurled from the throne for attempting, Louis Philip, under more favourable circumstances, triumphantly consummated, almost without eliciting a single popular expression of disapproval. Some petitions were got up in the departments against the press law, but, generally speaking, the French evinced either total indifference or lukewarm zeal against this arbitrary inroad on their lately conquered liberties. In Paris this apathy was decidedly more obvious than in the country, and the citizens, shrugging up their shoulders, sought amusement in their political humiliation, by giving a name to the new code of laws derived from the criminal in whom they ostensibly originated, calling them les lois Fieschi!

Aug. 11. Belgium chambers met. By the new elections of one half the deputies, which took place in June, the liberals had rather gained on the ministerialists. Their deliberations were chiefly directed to the protecting the country from becoming the uncontrolled receptacle of political agitators from France and Germany, by an alien act, and the cotton manufactures, by means of higher prohibitory duties. The latter was opposed, as being likely to call forth retaliatory measures from France, Switzerland, and Prussia. But the scheme of imposing higher duties, as well as that for establishing a control over foreigners, were both adopted by the legislature.

14. Mr. Spring Rice made his annual financial statement. Having given an account of the receipts and expenditure of the past year, he calculated that, after paying the interest of the West India loan, no greater surplus than from 150,000*l*. to 200,000*l*. could be safely counted upon for the year for which provision had been made. He, therefore, could not venture to propose any further repeal of taxation than a reduction of certain of the duties on glass and on spirit licences.

19. Colonel Fairman, secretary to the Orange society, being brought to the bar of the commons, was informed by the speaker that he was bound to produce to a committee of the house the correspondence-book in his possession, which the committee had required of him. The subject was resumed on the 20th, and, the colonel persisting in his refusal, the speaker issued a warrant for his apprehension, the execution of which the colonel defeated by absconding. Long discussions ensued on the right of the commons to search for papers in the possession of private individuals.

Sept. 5. A dinner given to lord Auckland, at the Albion tavern, by the directors of the East India Company, previously to his lordship setting out for India as governor-general.

8. A musical festival commenced at York, which was continued for several successive days. Among the most distinguished of the visitors on this occasion were the duchess of Kent, princess Victoria, duke and duchess of Northumberland, earls Cawdor, Fitzwilliam, lords Miltou and Morpeth.

10. Captain Back and his companions arrived at Liverpool, from their perilous Arctic land expedition. The gallant officer and his companions visited the Great Fish river, and examined its source to the Polar Seas.

A dinner given to captain Hindmarsh at the Albion Tavern, as the governor of the newly-founded colony of South Australia. Colonel Torrens in the chair.

10. PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—The king came in person to prorogue parliament after a toilsome and unusually protracted session. The great legislative performance of the year was the reform of the English municipal corporations, of which a notice has been already given. There were other statutes passed, effecting salutary amendments and of great national importance. Among these, were the acts framed by sir James Graham for the improvement of the naval code, and thereby increasing our naval power; first, by an act for amending and consolidating the laws relative to merchant-seamen, and for establishing a registry of all the men engaged in the merchant service; and secondly by an act, the object of which is to encourage the voluntary enlistment of seamen into the royal navy, by limiting the period of service to five years; unless in case of special emergency, when they may be detained six months longer, with one-fourth increase of pay. Seamen are allowed to provide substitutes, and are entitled to certificates of protection for two years, at the expiration of their terms of service. While it was thought a hazardous experiment to abolish the prerogative right of naval impressment, it is expected that the exercise of this power will seldom be requisite except on sudden and pressing occasions, under the inducements offered voluntarily to enter the king's service.

Our antiquated patent laws had long been a subject of complaint, and an obstacle to the promulgation of useful discoveries and inventions. An act was framed and passed, under the auspices of lord Brougham, for removing some of their more obvious and glaring defects. One grievance of the old system was the destruction of all right to a patent, which resulted from an inadvertent claim put in to any part of an invention that might not actually be new, although that circumstance should be unknown to the inventor; and even although the part claimed should be a small and unessential portion of the new invention. This defect is obviated, and a patentee who finds he has been anticipated in some portion of his invention may disclaim that portion, and still retain his exclusive privilege in the remainder. If a patentee have reproduced some old invention, believing himself to be the inventor, a power is vested in the crown to continue the patent to the patentee, when it appears that the invention had not been publicly and generally used. A patentee is protected from vexatious actions questioning the validity of his patent, the certificate of the judge who tried one action operating as a bar to future suits. Lastly an important advantage is given by the power vested in the crown, of extending, on the recommendation of the privy council, the term of a patent from fourteen to twenty-one years. Under the old law a valuable patent often expired just about the time the difficulties attending its first introduction had been surmounted, and it was beginning to be profitable to the inventor. This was the case with the improvements of Watt on the steam-engine, which, from prejudice and other causes, were hardly in general use when his exclusive privilege had ceased.

Other legislative measures carried during the session were the following:—

Limitation of the duration of the poll to one day, in borough elections, in England and Scotland.

Establishing a copyright in lectures.

Abolishing in Scotland imprisonment for debt for small sums.

Consolidating offices of receiver-general and comptroller in the stamp-duties, with the like offices in the land and assessed taxes.

Amending the highway laws.

Empowering the substitution of declarations in lieu of oaths, in the Treasury, in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and in the bank of England.

Facilitates intercourse with foreign parts by regulating the postage of letters.

Regulates the conveyance of colonial passengers.

Death-punishment abolished for letter-stealing and sacrilege.

Linen and hempen manufacture of Ireland regulated.

Prevents vexatious removal of indictments into the court of King's Bench, and extends provisions for taking bail in cases of felony.

Inspectors of prisons appointed, and greater uniformity of practice introduced in the prison regulations of England and Wales.

Statutes for the enforcement of uniformity in weights and measures consolidated and improved.

The number of private bills that received the royal assent was 160, namely, 4 agriculture; 3 companies; 42 improvements of towns and districts; 33 roads; 18 railways; 4 canals; 1 river; 10 navigation; 44 private regulation. The private bills passed exceeded those of 1831 by eighteen.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—The alterations made by the lords in the municipal corporations bill, their refusal to pass the Irish church bill with the appropriation clause, their rejection of the Dublin police and other bills that had passed the commons, rendered them an object of pointed attack by the radical or movement party. Experience during the last two years, it was contended, had amply shown the necessity of reform, and of assimilating the upper to the lower house in spirit, practice, and constitution. The subject was agitated by the public press, discussed at public meetings, and, towards the close of the parliamentary session, even in the house of commons. On the occasion of presenting one of several petitions that had been got up for a reform of the lords' house, Mr. Roebuck intimated his intention next session of moving to bring in a bill for taking away the veto possessed by the lords on all measures of legislation, and substituting for it a suspensive power; so that, if a bill rejected by the lords should pass the commons a second time, and receive the royal assent, it might become law without the concurrence of the peers. Mr. Rippon gave notice of a motion to remove the bishops from the legislature, and Mr. Hume indignantly denounced the ceremonial observances which prevailed between the two houses. At a conference the members of the commons are obliged to stand with their hats off, while the peers are covered and seated. The whole proceeding on such occasions is seldom more than the exchange of two pieces of paper, oral discussion not being permitted. It was, he said, a perfect mockery, like everything else connected with the other house. On the rising of parliament, Mr. O'Connell set forth on a mission to probagate reform doctrines among the presbyterians of Scotland. He received dinners at Manchester, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and in eloquent and vehement harangues denounced the hereditary legislators as the great obstructives of wholesome legislation. He carefully guarded himself, however, against being considered the advocate of one chamber of legislation: he contended for the reform, not the abolition, of the lords. His popularity, and the fascinations of his oratory, attracted everywhere a numerous audience; but generally the middle classes kept aloof, and seemed not prepared to countenance his project for converting the peerage into an elective assembly.

Sept. 14. M. Mendizabal authorised by the queen-regent of Spain to form a cabinet. Much was anticipated from the appointment of the new prime minister, who enjoyed a reputation in Spain and Portugal for great energy and firmness amidst difficulties and dangers; and to him Spain looked to put a stop to the progress of anarchy. Mendizabal was well known in London, where he had latterly resided, as the financial agent of Portugal, and had essentially contributed to the establishment of the constitutional government of Donna Maria in that kingdom. He proposed to give a more liberal character to the regent's government, and to interest the masses in its support by a new electoral law, and giving greater liberty to the press.

Oct. 1. NEW CONSTITUTION OF DENMARK.—An unexpected change has taken place in the government of this kingdom. From the middle of the 17th century Denmark had been governed by a system of absolute power, voluntarily established by the population itself. She had possessed her estates, like the other communities of the north, and her commons formed a constituent part of these estates. Irritated by the insolence, and desirous to ensure protection against the oppressions, of the nobility, the commons joined the crown in 1660, and formally abrogated the estates, placing all power in the hands of the king. Since that time the Danes had been governed by an absolute monarch, and so governed that they had evinced no desire for any change in their institutions. In the course of the present year the king voluntarily created a representative body, under the name of the royal council, which assembled for the first time at Copenhagen on the 1st inst. The royal commissioner, in his opening address, commented on the new constitution that had been granted. His majesty had ordained that certain men, freely chosen by their fellow-subjects, should assemble at stated periods in order to deliberate on the interests of the country, preparatory to the framing of the royal decrees relative to those interests. The propriety of calling to such deliberations none but men independent in circumstances, and whose interests attach them to the principle of public order, induced the king to make landed property the basis of eligibility. The electoral system is alleged to rest on a broader basis than in some other countries reckoned constitutional. Leaseholders are qualified to vote for members of the council, and are even qualified to be chosen representatives. The object of the landed qualification is to produce a rural representation that may counterbalance that of the cities. The deputies are chosen by direct election, contrary to the practice of France and Spain, where the primitive electors name other electors, who ultimately elect the representatives. The representative chamber freely elects its president or speaker. Such are the leading points in the magna charta that the Danish monarch has vouchsafed to his subjects, and which is declared to have been an unsolicited and spontaneous emanation of the royal will. Denmark has thus passed without a struggle from an arbitrary to a constitutional monarchy, and exhibited in her history the singular spectacle of a voluntary surrender of her liberties to the sovereign, who, after holding them 175 years, with the entire satisfaction of all parties, again restored unasked the boon to the people.

4. This day, though Sunday, was pretty generally celebrated over the country, in the different churches and chapels, as a centenary of the Reformation, the printing of the first English Bible (that of bishop Coverdale) having, as appears from the colophon, been finished on October 4, 1535.

11. Their majesties, attended by a party, visited Greenwich, being the anniversary of the battle of Camperdown. A monument by Chantrey, erected under the orders of the king, to the memory of the late Keats, formerly master of the Greenwich Hospital, was dedicated on this day, the first time.

21. The first school of the new London school, which sits in the old Honey-lane, having been opened by Mr. Brougham, in the presence of a committee appointed by the government to superintend the instruction of the children of the corporation.

27. Earl Gosford, appointed governor-in-chief of Canada, and bearing the commission sent out by the British government to investigate and report on the grievances complained of by the Canadians, opened the parliament of Lower Canada with a speech, in which he expressed the members of his anxiety to dispense, if possible, the differences by which the colony had been for some time agitated. Upon those that belonged merely to the administrative practice of the Government, such assurances were given as would probably, if the controversy had been confined to them, be entirely satisfactory. In regard to the constitutional changes demanded by the popular party, the language employed by his excellency was not so definite.

The Irish government, in answer to many applications, have decided that the military or police shall not be permitted to aid in the collection of tithes; nor be called out in any case of the enforcement of civil rights by distress, unless their presence be rendered necessary by actual riot.

31. There appeared in the Times of to-day a correspondence that had taken place between Mr. sheriff Raphael and Mr. O'Connell, relative to the terms of a pecuniary engagement, by which the former, through the influence of the latter, had been returned to parliament for the county of Carlow, but had been unseated upon a petition.

The grand review at Kalisch this month, on which point troops had been so long concentrating, and which, according to some, was to lead to an almost general continental war, has passed over as a splendid pageantry; and so has the conference of the emperors of Russia and Austria and the king of Prussia at Toplitz.

REGISTRATION COURTS.—The public attention during the month has been chiefly occupied with the proceedings of these courts, which have been held throughout the country for the annual revision of the registration lists of electors. This year the contest of parties has been waged on this arena with much more zealous effort and more systematic tactics than on any former occasion. The objections that have been made to names in the overseers' lists have been somewhat strenuous, and the Government's intervention has accordingly been regarded as all-gone, and furnishing important indications as to the result of the election, even at the polling-hour, whenever they may come. As usual in this kind of thing, both the friends of the candidates and their opponents make insinuations about the gamblers—each party going to the same conclusion as much as they wish to—either as by anything said or as by nothing holding it good policy to keep the spirits of their adherents by such representations. The propagation of sentiment, and the dispersion of money, even over the country after their settlement, and the application in the metropolitan area, also been taken advantage of, as the coming up of numerous provincial difficulties in the way of dinner-eating and evening. The tone which this kind of country agitation has taken indicates something rather than an approximation of the two great contending parties in the case.

Nov. 24. A public dinner given to Lord John Russell, at Bristol, on which occasion a place of plate, which had been purchased by subscriptions of a sixpence from each person was presented. Lords Seagrave and Ebrington, and Mr Moore, the poet, were present, and addressed the meeting.

The new commissioners of charities appointed under 5 and 6 Wm. 4 c. 71, had their first meeting in Great George-street, lord Brougham (chief commissioner) in the chair. It is expected that this commission will terminate an inquiry which has been in progress since 1816, and has produced upwards of thirty folio volumes of reports. The total annual income of the public charities already investigated appears, from a parliamentary return of this year, to amount to 748,178*l.* exclusive of 24 charities under the chartered companies of London applicable to education and other purposes.

13. Donna Maria, queen of Portugal, has achieved something new in politics. She has dismissed and recalled a ministry all in one day! Unable to form a new administration she was compelled to accept the services of her former advisers, with Saldanha at their head. In a week after, Saldanha was a second time dismissed, and marquis Loule appointed prime minister. The change was satisfactory to the populace and the national guard. Both in Portugal and Spain the ultra-liberal party is on the advance.

16. Isabella, queen-regent of Spain, opened the cortes in a speech, in which she alluded to her choice of M. Mendizabal as prime minister, and expressed her confident expectation that, by the exertions and policy of the new government, the civil war of Spain would be put an end to and peace restored to that distracted country. There is a persuasion abroad that this expectation will be realized, the armies under Mina and other Quenete generals have been reinforced. In the choice of a president, however, in the lower house, the Mendizabal ministry was defeated, which indicates jealousy or want of confidence in the new premier.

27. Hatfield House, the seat of the marquis of Salisbury, nearly destroyed by fire. The dowager marchioness of Salisbury, in whose room the fire originated, perished in the flames. She was upwards of 84 years old, and her head-dress is supposed to have caught fire while reading or writing.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.—The inhabitants of Texas, aided by adventurers from New Orleans, have declared themselves independent of the government of Mexico. In their declaration they declare as general Santa Anna and other military chiefs of having overthrown, by force of arms, the federal institutions of Mexico, and dissolved the social compact which existed between Texas and the other members of the Mexican confederacy.

Dec 2. A meeting of the proprietors of the London University was held, lord Brougham in the chair, to consider the propositions of government respecting the grant of a charter. The plan proposed is, to incorporate the university as a college, to grant similar charters of incorporation to such other educational bodies as may hereafter be established in the metropolis, and to establish, by charter, a board of men eminent in literature and science to perform the functions of examiners, and who will be empowered to grant degrees (except degrees in divinity) to candidates educated at such chartered colleges, the board to be termed "The University of London." After a debate of some length, resolutions were unanimously passed approving of the government propositions.

3. A meeting was held at the Freemasons' Tavern for the purpose of raising funds for the support of such clergymen of the established church in Ireland as are distressed by the non payment of their tithes. The archbishop of Canterbury was in the chair. The king sent a donation of 500*l*., and nearly 12 000*l* were stated by the bishop of London to have been subscribed up to the close of the meeting.

6. Marshal Clausel, governor of Algeria, accompanied by the duke of Orleans, mastered the town of Mascara, which they burned and razed to the ground. Before effecting this entrance, they had twice to give battle to Abdel Kader and his Arabs, who fought with determined bravery, and were routed only through the superiority of the French artillery.

16. Great fire in New York. The number of buildings destroyed is 674, comprising public edifices and ranges of spacious and valuable warehouses. An immense number of mercantile firms have been dislodged, and 2000 persons thrown out of employment. The property destroyed is valued at 20 millions of dollars. The fire burned over an area of 52 acres, densely built upon, and exclusively devoted to commercial pursuits. Active measures have been adopted by congress and the banks, by loans, and an extension of the private credit of the merchants, to alleviate the calamity.

17. The London court of aldermen having refused to admit sheriff Solomons of their number, as alderman of Aldgate, on the ground that he had refused to subscribe the usual declaration "on the true faith of a Christian" his election was set aside, and Mr. Humphreys, M.P., was chosen. Mr. Solomons is of the Hebrew persuasion.

25. First election of the town-councils under the municipal corporations act. The result has been a general ejection of the old boroughmonger voters, and the substitution of members of the liberal party. In a few of the smaller boroughs a majority of conservatives has been chosen; but in all the great towns, with scarcely an exception, the reformers have obtained an ascendancy, which places the management of affairs entirely in their hands. On the declaration, next day, of the election of the new councillors, the existing common councils, mayors, and aldermen, who for two centuries had exercised local power and patronage, went out of office, and their duties and functions for ever ceased.

29. French parliament opened by the king. Regret was expressed that the dispute relative to the American claims (see p. 947) had not yet been settled, but Britain had offered to mediate between France and the United States. M. Dupin was re-elected president of the chamber. The address on the king's speech was carried in the deputies by a majority of 246 against 67.

Lighthouses.—The management of lighthouses, and the dues levied on British shipping for their maintenance, were reported upon last session by a committee of the house of commons. It appears that there are in all 219 lights in the United Kingdom, namely 195 public general lights on land, and 17 floating lights; 93 local or harbour lights on land, and 4 floating lights. Of 134 public general lighthouses, 55 are held by the Trinity House, 14 by private individuals, 25 by commissioners of Northern lighthouses, and 40 by commissioners of the ballast board, Ireland. The gross dues collected on these 134 lighthouses amount to 240,000*l.*, charges of collection to 22,135*l.*, expense of maintenance to 74,632*l.*, leaving a surplus revenue of 142,433*l.*

Irish Church.—The following distribution of the population of Ireland in 1834, in respect of religion, is derived, by Mr. Hamilton (one of the commissioners), from the first report of the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Inquiry:—

Members of the Established Church	852,064
Roman Catholics	6,427,712
Presbyterians	642,356
Other Protestant Dissenters	21,308

Total population in parishes . . 7,943,940

STATE OF FRANCE.—Events in this country, the principal of which have been mentioned, possessed, in the present year, unusual interest. After five years of perturbation, amounting almost to anarchy—after a vain struggle to establish a liberty incompatible with human passions or existing intelligence—France has again been compelled to seek tranquillity, if not contentment, under the ascendancy of despotic powers. Arbitrary punishments, secret and arbitrary tribunals without appeal, have been substituted in place of a fixed, open, and impartial judicial administration. The liberty of the press, by the able exercise of which the throne of the elder Bourbon had been overturned, and the authority of Louis Philip and his doctrinaire supporters established, has been extinguished by the statesmen who most profited by its powerful agency, as inconsistent with civil peace and the stability of the new government. The problem of governing mankind by uniform and just principles seems solved, and its impracticability admitted. For theory, French statesmen have substituted the convictions of experience. Enlightened by the past, they no longer appeal to an abstract justice, or to its coherence with a preconceived system for the vindication of their policy, but to its practical effects on the public welfare. At the commencement of the session of 1835 ministers told the chambers to look for their system in the consequences it had evolved,—prosperity at home, and peace, respect, and influence abroad. "If any man," said M. Thiers, the minister of the interior, "had predicted, in July, 1830, a revolution will take place—it will subvert a throne—and yet for four years not a scaffold will be erected—for four years afterwards the country will be in security, and not only in the enjoyment of peace, but surrounded with a cordon of constitutional states—tranquillity will prevail throughout Europe—the national prosperity superior to anything known under the Restoration, after fifteen years of peace—instead of national bankruptcy, the deficiency in the revenue caused by the Restoration gradually reduced;—had such language been held, would it have been credited? And yet these results were not imaginary; they were real and admitted of incontestable proof. In Switzerland, aristocratic government had been replaced by popular government. The hostile kingdom of the Netherlands had been dissolved. The monkish government of Ferdinand of Spain had been replaced by a constitutional monarchy. Don Miguel had been replaced on the throne of Portugal by Lisa Maria. How had these results been accomplished without a war, and with the consent of Europe?—by the wisdom of the ministerial system?—which, as the minister might have been told, was no system at all, but a course of expediency guided by shifting circumstances. The eternal prosperity of France, which, in the midst of all her political changes and conflicts, had never paused since the general peace of 1815, was an undoubted fact. The annual deficiency in her revenue, which in 1829 amounted to 53,000,000 of francs, had been reduced to 21,000,000, and in 1838 was expected to disappear altogether. (Ann. Reg. lxxvii. 389.) Notwithstanding this result, she still failed to present a high example of industrial intelligence or legislative wisdom. She was still a country of anomalies, of monopolies and civil inequalities. Her repugnance to a free and unrestricted commercial intercourse with foreigners was hardly less narrow and bigoted than that of the Chinese. All attempts effectually to reform her custom-house tariff, by which her native products might be freely exchanged for those of other nations on terms of mutual benefit, had been defeated, either from the predominance of class interests, or the limited information of her merchants. The government itself, like the rapacious pasha of Egypt, set the example, and was the chief monopolist of the community. It was the sole and exclusive salesman of tobacco to the people. All the tobacco grown in France is bought exclusively and without competition by the government, at its own remunerative price, and sold at its own arbitrary price to the consumer. This monopoly was introduced by Napoleon, who, in his wild crusade against British commerce, sought to render France independent of external products. It has been repeatedly assailed by the opposition, but the exclusive privilege is too profitable to be hastily abandoned. Under the existing law the monopoly would have expired, Jan. 1, 1837, had not ministers in 1835 introduced a bill to continue it five years longer. The finance minister, who had been its enemy when not in office, defended the proposal, principally on the ground that the monopoly yields a yearly revenue of 2,000,000*l.*, which could not be replaced without other imposts that would fall heavily on the country. Several ministerial deputies opposed the measure, which was only carried by a small majority. The representative, no less than the commercial system of France, is unjust and exclusive, and a cry has been raised, that must ultimately command attention, for parliamentary reform. Compared with the wealth and population of the kingdom, the electoral body is too limited in numbers to embody, and proportionately sustain in the legislature, all interests. Previous to the revolution of 1830 the elective franchise was confined to individuals paying an annual amount of contribution of 300 francs. (12*l.*) This qualification, applied to a population of 32 millions, yielded a number of electors which never fell below 80,000, and never exceeded 100,000. In modifying the charter after the expulsion of Charles X., the qualification was reduced to 200 francs, or 8*l.* In consequence of this reduction, the number of electors rose to 280,000. Even this number appears an inadequate guarantee of elective independence, in so populous, rich, and flourishing a community; but it has been since reduced to 180,000, by the operation of the law of inheritance—a cause of diminution that operates simultaneously with human mortality. By this law, which renders compulsory the equal partition of a man's landed estate among his children, the division of property is incessantly going on. The land-tax averages 7½ per cent. An estate of about 2600 francs a-year giving a qualification for the land-tax amounts to 200 francs. On the death of the proprietor, however, unless he leaves only one child, the qualification is at an end, for, when divided even among two, each pays only 100 francs. Thus individuals are constantly being thrown, as it were, out of the pale of the constitution. Some idea may be formed of the effect of this process, when it is considered that no fewer than 10,200,000 distinct properties in land were registered as paying land-tax. Of the whole number there were not 1000 that paid 5000 francs, affording decisive evidence of the absence of great territorial accumulation. The diminutive number of electors has affected the independence of the representative chamber. With only 180,000 electors the electoral colleges have become, like the nomination boroughs of England before the passing of the Reform Act, select bodies extremely susceptible of private, and still more of government influence. The existing chamber, elected in 1834, contained 200 members who were government functionaries, two-thirds of them being removable at pleasure; while the remaining third served not indeed under the fear of dismissal, but the hope of promotion. It is impossible this restriction of the franchise can pass unchallenged in a country still enamoured with republican institutions, and especially under a dynasty deriving its elevation from the popular suffrage. Accordingly in the late session numerous petitions were presented praying for reform, but they were not agreed in the objects of their prayers; and, moreover, seemed to speak the sentiments of a party, whose views went further than a fair and efficient representation. Some of them prayed for direct election and universal suffrage; others for indirect election, but universal suffrage, in the primary electors; others for the abolition of the money qualification of the members; and others for the payment of wages to the deputies. The committee, to whom the petitions had been referred, unanimously proposed to the chamber to put them aside by passing to the order of the day, on the ground that France possessed too many elements of discord to allow of the electoral system being modified without danger. In this conclusion they are supported by the acquiescence of the middle ranks, who, embodied in the national guard, constitute the strength and safeguard of the community. Even the arbitrary laws of last summer (see Aug. 4) were so opportunely introduced, and so plausibly justified, that they passed without rousing any manifestation of general dislike. The industrious and profit-loving Bourgeois have certainly had changes enough—they want peace at home and abroad, and to be allowed to earn and eat their bread in tranquillity. Alarmed and wearied by the never-ending émeutes, and often sanguinary broils of Paris and Lyons, they are willing to purchase quiet and security at the expense of a democratic liberty, which, if not nominal and anarchical, is transitory, as the successive tyrannies of Robespierre and Buonaparte, based on popular ignorance and extravagance, have too painfully attested. The closing year, however, though disastrous, has not been all loss and no gain to constitutional freedom. A bill passed during the session to fix and regulate ministerial responsibility. It provides that no act emanating from the king in his royal capacity can be executed except under the responsibility of a minister, and whoever puts such an act in execution when not countersigned by a minister, is personally responsible. Each minister is made personally responsible for the acts countersigned by him, and all of them are made collectively responsible for the general measures of government in which they have taken a part. Thus a guarantee of official conduct is secured, that only vaguely or constructively exists in the British constitution.

GERMANY.—In this country has risen a new school of reformers in politics, literature, and morals. They are poets and novelists, no less than publicists. Under the appellation of “Young Germany,” or “Young Literature,” they advocate the supremacy of reason to custom, of talent to hereditary privileges. The chief promulgators of these opinions have already become the victims of persecution, and compelled to seek refuge in France and Belgium. Their writings were denounced by a decree of the diet, which declared, that their manifest tendency was “to destroy in the most audacious manner the Christian religion, degrade the actual relations of society, and extinguish all education and morality.” All the governments, therefore, engaged to enforce in their full rigour the laws of the different states against the authors and publishers of such works, and to prevent their circulation by sale, circulating libraries, or otherwise. The decree set forth by name the leading authors of the obnoxious doctrines, namely, Heine, Gutzkow, Laube, Mundt, and Wienburg.

LITERATURE—RUSSIA.—According to a report from the board of censors for foreign publications, 300,000 volumes of books in foreign languages were imported into the Russian dominions during the year 1834; this is nearly 29,000 more than in the year preceding. There appeared under the cognizance of the board of censors for the home department 728 original works, and 116 translations, which give a total of 844 new publications in the Russian language. The same board sanctioned the appearance of 48 newspapers. Last year the ministry of public instruction sanctioned the printing of 113,200 copies of school-books of various descriptions; and in the same interval 94 additional public schools, including the university of St. Vladimir, at Kief, were opened.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—After repeated legislative attempts, the arduous undertaking of establishing an invariable and uniform standard of weights and measures throughout the United Kingdom, appeared in the present year to be accomplished. In 1824 an imperial standard yard, pound, gallon, and bushel were fixed, and the principle laid down on which they might be renewed if lost or destroyed. The old wine-gallon of 231 cubic inches; the ale and beer-gallon, 282 inches; the old corn-gallon, 268½ inches, are abolished; and the imperial gallon, of rather more than 277½ cubic inches, and holding ten pounds avoirdupois weight of distilled water weighed in air at 62 degrees of Fahrenheit, the barometer being at 30 inches, is substituted. The act commenced Jan. 1, 1826, but, though useful in gradually accustoming the public to a new system, it failed, during the nine years of its operation, to effect general uniformity in practice. This has been enforced by the statutes of 1834 and 1835, and all local weights and measures, other than that of the imperial standard, are prohibited. The custom of selling goods by heaped measure; that is, by heaping them up in the form of a cone above the brim, is prohibited; and they must now be sold by the bushel filled to the level of the brim, or by weight. Coals must be sold by weight only. The previously uncertain quantity of a stone, is fixed at 14 pounds, and eight stone the hundred weight. All articles must be sold by the imperial pound except gold, silver, platinum, or precious stones, which may be sold by troy weight. Weights must be made of brass or iron; the use of lead, pewter, or other soft metal, being prohibited, because of the facility they afford for fraud, and the diminution they speedily undergo from abrasion. One omission has been pointed out in the present measure, in not having fixed the ratio between the diameter and depth of the bushel. A shallow bushel, of equal cubic capacity with a deeper, holds less corn or other article that lies more or less close towards the bottom, according to the pressure of the column above.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Paris, M. Dupuytren, 57, the eloquent professor of surgery at the Hôtel Dieu. He left his daughter a fortune of nearly 7,000,000 of francs; 1,200,000 francs to found a professorship of medico-chirurgical pathology, and 300,000 francs for an asylum for twelve superannuated medical men. In the Regent's Park, Henry David Inglis, 40, author of several books of travels in Sweden, the Tyrol, Spain, and Ireland. Mr. Inglis was a native of Scotland, the only son of a barrister, and his maternal grandmother was the daughter of the celebrated colonel Gardiner, who fell at Preston Pans. At Dorchester, Richard Sharp, F.R.S., 76, a gentleman well known in the literary world as "Conversation Sharp." Though extensively engaged in commerce, in which he accumulated a large fortune, Mr. Sharp possessed a very correct taste in literature, and a small volume of Essays he left behind him are remarkable for sense and judgment. In St. George's fields, William Henry Ireland, better known as "Shakespeare Ireland," who was the author of several novels and a history of Napoleon, but the works that will longest preserve his memory are the celebrated forgeries of the bard of Avon. (See p. 597.) Captain Kater, 58, an able mathematician, who assisted colonel Lambton in his trigonometrical survey of India, and who co-operated in establishing the imperial standard of weights and measures. John Pitt, earl of Chatham, 80; son of the first and brother of the second William Pitt: the title and pension are extinct. Thomas Pringle, 46, secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, and editor of Blackwood's Magazine during the first six months of its existence. At Clapham, Mrs. Elizabeth Cook, 94, widow of the celebrated circumnavigator. At his seat, Isle of Wight, John Nash, 83, architect of the pavilion at Brighton and of Buckingham Palace, and the planner of Regent-street and Regent's Park. In the last he had recourse to the system originated by Wood of Bath, of uniting several separate dwellings in a single façade, and is a favourable specimen of his abilities. At Dublin, Mrs. Hemans, a much-admired poetess, who first began to be generally known by her scattered lyrics, which appeared in the New Monthly Magazine, then under the direction of Campbell. William Smith, late M. P. for Norwich, 79, forty-six years in parliament, and the leading advocate of the dissenters. Dr. Pughe, 76, Welsh lexicographer, who translated Milton's "Paradise Lost" into the ancient British language. James Denison, 75, founder of the commercial travellers' society. Joseph Todd, late of Fore-street, 68; he commenced business as a haberdasher in 1793 with very small means, and retired in 1822 with a fortune of nearly a million sterling. In Fleet-street, Edward Troughton, 81, discoverer of an ingenious mode of graduating mathematical instruments, for which in 1809 he received the Copley medal. Henry O'Brien, 27, author of an ingenious dissertation on the Round Towers of Ireland. Michael Thomas Sadler, 58, a merchant of Leeds, who, in 1829, on the Newcastle interest in Newark, was returned to parliament, where he distinguished himself by an eloquent oration against the catholic claims. Mr Sadler was educated at Rome, and intended for a learned profession. He was the author of a work on Ireland, and another, in which he tried to impugn the Malthusian principle of population. Dr. Brinkley, Bishop of Cloyne, 72, an able mathematician, who is supposed in 1814 to have discovered the parallax of the fixed stars. At Paris, signor Bellini, 29, composer of I Puritani, &c. At Paris, Don Telesforo de Trueba, 30, author of several dramas in French, Spanish, and English; and among them the popular farce of "Call again to-morrow." Trueba was also a contributor to the Metropolitan Magazine and other periodicals. At Edinburgh, Sir John Sinclair, 82, late cashier of the excise, and a voluminous writer on statistics and agriculture.

A.D. 1836. PROSPEROUS STATE OF THE KINGDOM.—At the close of the past and commencement of the present year, the United Kingdom exhibited unusual signs of internal contentment and general prosperity. With the exception of partial depression in agriculture, all the great branches of national industry were unusually prosperous. In the great clothing districts of Yorkshire and Lancashire the times were never known to be more favourable. In spite of the great development of the cotton-trade, it still continued to expand, and its utmost bounds seemed illimitable. It was the same with the woollen manufacture of Leeds and Huddersfield, the stuff manufacture of Bradford and Halifax, the linen manufacture of Barnsley and Knaresborough, the blanket and flannel manufactures of Dewsbury and Rochdale, they were all thriving. Even in the silk trade of Macclesfield, Coventry, and Spitalfields, there were no complaints; no more than in the hosiery and lace trades of Nottingham, Derby, and Leicester. The potteries of Staffordshire continued prosperous, and the iron trade, in all its branches, was unusually flourishing. While manufacturing industry was in a state of energetic activity in the interior of the kingdom, it is almost superfluous to remark, that the shipowners in the outports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, Glasgow, and Hull, were not quiescent. One fact testifies to the prosperousness of commerce and existence of mercantile confidence, namely, the low rate of interest. Although there had been during the last twelvemonth several demands on the resources of moneyed men, the funds maintained a steady buoyancy; and the numerous projects on foot for improving the great lines of travelling and conveyance, at once attested abundance of pecuniary means and a lively spirit of improvement. That the general prosperity rested on stable grounds, there were solid reasons for concluding. A spirit of enterprise was abroad, but not of wild speculation. Except the mania for railways, which raged in England in common with other nations, there was no other abroad; and the avidity with which shares were bought up in these undertakings, was justified by the actual success which had attended those of Liverpool and Manchester, Stockton and Darlington, Leeds and Selby. In 1824 the case was different; it was then pure castle-building; credit afforded unlimited means, and no project was too extravagant for support. At present, there was no want of commercial confidence, but it was a confidence indulged under a salutary reminiscence of former disasters. If anything could tend to its undue development, it was the state of the monetary system, which continued the most defective branch of industrial polity, and required unceasing watchfulness. It is as much a function of state to provide a safe and uniform currency, as a uniform standard of weights and measures, or a uniform and impartial course of judicial administration. None of the numerous provincial joint-stock banks of issue that had been established under an act of the last reign, (7 Geo. 4. c. 46,) appear to have a subscribed capital exceeding two millions, with a paid-up capital of half a million. For one bank with so large a capital, there were many who did not possess a capital of a quarter of that amount, and as they frequently extended into branches in various parts of the country, the liabilities and consequent danger of the parent bank were increased. One bank with a capital of 600,000*l.*, had nearly 40 branches in Bristol, Birmingham, Liverpool, Leeds, Manchester, Nottingham, and other places. In some banks, neither the amount of subscribed or paid-up capital was known, which carried on, nevertheless, extensive business and had numerous branches. The subject, in the ensuing session, drew the attention of parliament, and, at the instance of Mr Clay, a committee of inquiry was appointed. Its investigations were not completed during the session, but enough was discovered to show the great irregularities and inconsistencies in the management of joint-stock banks; that they were not conducted on uniform and systematic principles; that the functions of the managing directors were not sufficiently defined and often irresponsibly exercised; and that, partly, from this cause and partly from the vague provisions of the partnership deeds, neither the interests of the shareholders nor of the public were adequately protected. In this state of things, there was obviously cause for circumspection, though none, perhaps, for general alarm. One ground of confidence—at least, in the old banking firms of the kingdom,—is the better knowledge, which the disastrous experience of former years had afforded, of the principles which ought to regulate banking associations in their advances to individuals, and in their issues of paper money. The withdrawal of the small notes, too, is a guarantee against a popular, if not a commercial panic; and, as the obligation imposed on private bankers compels them to make periodical returns of their average circulation, timely notice is thereby afforded of the approach of the plague of over-issue, which the bank of England would be culpably remiss in not checking on the first symptom of a redundant currency. Upon the whole, much of the machinery, as well as the material of commercial and manufacturing prosperity, seemed safe and sound, and the natural result of lengthened peace at home and abroad, conjoined with a succession of the most favourable seasons. On the other hand there was, as before observed, complaints of AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS. Farmers and landlords looked at their diminished incomes, not outgoings; they thought of the great sums they received during the war, not of the great sums they paid. That there was general distress among them, it was difficult to believe. Relative distress will always subsist in agriculture; it is a condition inseparable from the cultivation of the soil. Farming will always be a poor trade. The inducements to invest capital in land are such, that the profits of husbandry will generally be depressed below the average profits of commerce and manufactures. This is not the only cause of depression. In England, where two-thirds of the land occupied are held by tenants at-will, if a farmer's profits increase, his rent will be proportionably increased. So that, pressed on one side by the greater competition of capital in his business; and on the other, by the increasing exactions of his landlord, he can never enjoy for a lengthened period an exuberant state of prosperity. The partial distress of landlords, though it originates in different causes, is almost as inevitable as that of their tenants. In every European community (France only excepted), the landed interest is in a state of pecuniary involvement. Everywhere estates are incumbered with debts, mortgages, and settlements. This, however, is not because the revenues they yield are small, but because they are inordinate. It is men of moderate, not of large incomes that live within them. The former are compelled to practise economy, to look after their affairs and live according to rule; the latter are regardless of these precautions. There are other peculiarities. Advances can always be obtained on real, not on chattel security. Hence land-owners are under great temptations to become borrowers:—add to this, the tenacity with which they seek to maintain the status of their order, by keeping up expenditure, and a key is afforded to their dilatoriness in adjusting themselves to altered circumstances. Time will probably alleviate most of the difficulties under which agriculture suffers. That they have not been generally ruinous the testimony of Mr. Charles Shaw Lefebvre, the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, which was appointed in the ensuing parliamentary session, satisfactorily established, and his opinion was corroborated by that of Messrs. Houghton, Scott, and other intelligent witnesses. That even rural industry has declined, is disproved by the broad fact that with a population annually increasing at the rate of a quarter of a million, the native produce of the country has been nearly adequate to the consumption of its inhabitants. The home produce has increased faster than the population; so that from the beginning of the century we have been becoming less dependent on foreign supplies. In the ten years from 1801 to 1810 the annual average import of wheat was 600,946 quarters; from 1811 to 1820, 458,578; from 1821 to 1830, 534,992; and in the five years from 1831 to 1835 inclusive the average import was only 398,509 quarters (Porter's Progress of the Nation, i. 146). During the last three years there has been hardly any importation of wheat from abroad, the markets have been supplied by wheat of English growth. The import of wheat from Ireland has increased, but not to such an extent as to affect the English grower. On an average of the three years ending January, 1836, the wheat imported from Ireland amounted to 553,274 quarters, and, on an average of the three years ending January, 1836, to 761,827 quarters; making an increase in the average supply of the last three years of only 208,553 quarters. In England the depression of agriculture has been chiefly caused by the low price of wheat; other produce has fetched good prices, and the remedy is a change of crops, the abandonment of the heavy soils, on which it cannot be raised at a remunerative price: this, aided by rural improvements, a commutation of tithe, a reduction in county and highway rates, an economical administration of the poor laws, and, above all, an adjustment of terms between landlord and farmer, holds out the best prospective remedies for agriculture. In these views many of the agriculturists begin to concur. Some of them have even lost faith in their favourite specific of corn-laws, and have discovered that agriculture cannot permanently thrive at the cost of manufactures, and that they must "wax and wane together." The currency savans have also begun to be discountenanced. A depreciation of money would not benefit the renting-farmer; it would only benefit those whose estates are charged with mortgages, and whose incumbrances concern only themselves. The delays of partial legislation for the encouragement of industry, or rather monopoly, are past. All that any class can expect, or a wise legislature concede, is equality of public imposts—security—and an open market all over the world. Some of the landed interest espoused the notion, that the establishment of a trade-union might be favourable to their interests; but the scheme appears not to have been carried out. Like the trade-unions of humbler individuals, it would, probably, have proved a rope of sand and unproductive of beneficial results. Meanwhile, the low price of provisions, and abundance of employment, both in manufacturing and rural industry, have been extremely favourable to the industrious orders. With the exception of the hand-loom weavers, whose occupation has been superseded by the general introduction of the power-loom, the condition of those who live on wages was never, perhaps, more favourable; they never enjoyed in greater profusion the comforts and necessities of life in food, lodging, and clothing. That such is their general state, is evidenced by a diminution in crime, of poor-rates, and emigration, and an increase in those branches of the public revenue principally falling on articles of ordinary consumption. From the industrial, a short advertence may be made to the POLITICAL ASPECTS of 1836. In these the signs were not less auspicious. There had perhaps never been a period more opportune for social ameliorations. Not a plot, nor a cannonade—not a single disturbance within or without the kingdom. There seemed a growing confidence in the individuals composing the administration. They were mostly considered persons of plain, but steady purposes, exempted from the égarements of genius; the mercurial talent that had oppressed or embarrassed them, was either stranded or cast overboard, and had drifted to leeward; what remained, consisted of men of patriotic intentions, of useful but not splendid gifts; circumspect and anxious to proceed on the best information. Although versed in the general principles of political science, they felt the necessity of shaping their measures to existing circumstances and clashing interests, and, moreover, were not so fettered by prejudice, as to reject amendments because they encroached on old associations and connexions. These were looked upon as the qualities chiefly needed. The pickaxe of reform having been struck into all the great fabrics of abuse,—what was most requisite, were steady and unflinching operatives to wheel away the rubbish. It followed that the changes in the original Whig Ministry, which at the time were considered to menace its efficiency and usefulness, had apparently, on trial, turned out improvements in its composition. Earl Grey had seemingly begun to feel alarm at the giant spirit he had evoked. He acted as though Democracy had done its work and ought to be stayed—hesitated—did nothing—and then took to flight. Lord Stanley and his party were bound up in an abstract proposition, when the country demanded a practical remedy for a practical grievance. The residue were considered better, for being more flexible and less self-dependent; they had to seek the co-operation of divers parties, and were ready to follow any onward impulse they might receive from a sufficiently audible and powerfully expressed public opinion. The most arduous of changes is a change in public sentiment. This difficulty had been overcome. The once ruling party that refused to admit the smallest amendment, on the pretext, that they could not trammel up its issues, had acknowledged the necessity of removing "proved abuses." With this concession, the Tories had abandoned the citadel of their strength. They had no longer ground on which an unflinching stand could be made; having admitted the principle, the limits of its application could not be prescribed.

Jan. 1. Queen of Portugal married by proxy to Prince Ferdinand Augustus, nephew of the reigning duke of Saxe-Cobourg, and of the king of the Belgians. By the marriage treaty, it is settled that the prince shall resign all his rights in Germany to his brothers and sisters; that he shall not assume the title of duke of Braganza till there is an heir to the throne, when he is to act as king of Portugal along with the queen; that, in the event of the queen's decease before the heir come of age, he shall be chosen king, as guardian to his successor, with an income of 35,000*l.* a-year.

Sir Charles Pepys, master of the rolls, created a peer by the title of lord Cottenham, and receives the seals of office as lord chancellor. Henry Bickersteth, esq., the Chancery barrister, has succeeded to the rolls, and been called to the house of lords with the title of baron Langdale. The great seal had been in commission since the resignation of sir R. Peel's ministry, and an impression was abroad that it had been reserved for lord Brougham as soon as certain objections to his re-appointment could be overcome.

Pensions granted by lord Melbourne to Mr. Banim, author of "Tales of the O'Hara Family," of 150*l.* a-year; and to Mr. B. Thorpe, the translator of Rask's Anglo-Saxon Grammar, of 100*l.* a-year. Lord Melbourne has directed 150*l.* to be paid out of the royal bounty fund to the widow of Mr. Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd.

4. Riots at Barcelona, during which upwards of 100 Carlists were brutally murdered by the populace. Among the victims was the young colonel O'Donnell, whose corpse was shockingly mutilated.

5. Meeting of bankers, merchants, and shipowners of London, at the Mansion House, to consider the best means of promoting the success of the Arctic expedition sent out under captain J. C. Ross, to the relief of the ice-bound whale-ships. Captain Ross sailed from Hull on the 6th. Since the expedition has been fitting out several of the whalers have reached this country; but the crews were in an exhausted condition, owing to their provisions having fallen short.

18. Trials of the Paris republicans (see p. 970) concluded. No single sentence of capital punishment was passed. Two of the prisoners only were acquitted, and some nineteen or twenty were condemned to transportation for life, or to different terms of imprisonment. The prisoners who escaped from prison were condemned en contumace.

29. DEATH OF LORD STOWEL.—This eminent civilian, better known as sir William Scott, expired at Early Court, near Reading, in the 91st year of his age. He was a privy councillor and master of the faculties, though he survived the loss of his own, and died without pain or consciousness after a few days' illness. He had only retired from the judgeship of the high court of Admiralty in 1828, an office he had filled with lustrous ability for thirty years. His will is dated April 30, 1830. The personality was sworn to be under 230,000*l.*, and the real estates at his lordship's death produced 18,000*l.* a-year. His only surviving child, lady Sidmouth, takes a life interest in the whole property, both real and personal; after which the landed estates descend to his great nephew, lord Encombe, the grandson of his brother, lord Eldon. The great lawyers, as before remarked in the case of lord Thurlow (p. 673), rarely succeed in striking their roots deep into the soil by a direct offshoot, and the vast amassings of professional life have been mostly lost among collateral or remote inheritors. The name of Stowel has had a fleeting place in the peerage, the bearer only being ennobled in 1821, and his only son, the hon. Wm. Scott, died unmarried two months before him, when the father from the loss of reason was happily insensible that no one survived to transmit his title. In other respects the two Scotts, William and John, were the most prosperous men of their time. Their father was a shrewd painstaking tradesman, who at Newcastle carried on the business of a fitter, that is a shipper of coals. Both the boys excelled at the grammar-school of the town, and were favourites of the master for quick perception, assiduity, and docility. When asked to give an account of the Sunday sermon, their father's weekly custom, the eldest, William, would repeat a sort of digest of the argument; John, on the other hand, recapitulated all the minutiae of the discourse, even the phrases of the preacher; he showed a memory complete and exact, but failed to give the scope and bearing of the sermon embodied in half the number of words by William. In after-life the brothers advanced pari passu, keeping abreast in the pursuit of riches and honours. They were knighted on attaining official rank within two months of each other; the advocate-general, sir William Scott, and the solicitor-general, sir John Scott, repaired for the first time to the same levee; they almost contemporaneously succeeded to the high legal offices they so long filled, John as lord chancellor, and William as admiralty judge; and the long war, which they jointly supported, was almost equally profitable; augmenting the income of John to an average of about 18,000*l.* per annum, and that of William to about 10,000*l.* It is also a remarkable coincidence in the biographies of these veteran Tories, that each can only be charged with one egrement likely to endanger their future prospects. John eloped to Gretna with the daughter of Mr. Surtees, the banker of Newcastle, before completing his legal studies, but never repeated his indiscretion in any analogous shape. The waywardness of William, too, was of a feminine kind, committed, however, not in the heyday of reckless adolescence, but when he had attained the mature age of 69, and presided over the highest tribunal of civil law. During the trial of the marquis of Sligo for prevarication, and for which he was sentenced to pay a fine of 5000*l.*, and be imprisoned four months in Newgate, the grave civilian became enamoured of the young peer's mother, who attended the court pending her son's trial; and, regardless of the warning example of Addison, who ambitiously united his fortunes to those of a lady of quality (countess of Warwick), he married her. The union was an unhappy one. The oracle of Doctors Commons in affairs matrimonial was unable to reconcile the perplexities of his own case. It is supposed that his known love of sight-seeing, of the Fives Court, Punch and Judy, and prize-battles, and his frequently communing in the Temple, were connected with the irksomeness of his own mansion, where the marchioness of Shigo presided. Bating this infelicity, the course of sir William appears to have been more fortunate and flowery than that of the lord chancellor; it was less in the thorny walk of politics. The whole of his youth, and the early prime of manhood, were spent among the literary and the learned, in the class and the lecture-room,—in the midst of libraries, and gardens, and academic groves; enjoying occasionally the quiet luxuries of "the ride to Abingdon, the walk in Christ Church meadows, the stroll in Magdalen walks, the society of the common room;"—scenes and recollections which, we are told, sir William always prized with such fond remembrance, that an old Oxford calendar, by the associations it awakened, was to him as "a volume of poetry" (Law Magazine, xxiii. 31). He was eighteen years a college tutor, occupied in training the intellect of the aristocracy in classical and historical knowledge. During the next fifteen years he shone in the literary circles of London, the "Dr. Scott of the Commons," the friend of Johnson, lord Spencer, sir Joseph Banks, Reynolds, Burke, and Wigham, —the favourite of the Turk's Head Club. The next thirty were spent in the Admiralty chair, in accumulating riches from naval prizes, and in forming a system of international law from the ill-fashioned toils of his predecessors. The manners of lord Stowell are described as attaching in the highest degree. "They were at once graceful, courtier-like, and dignified, totally free from pride and affectation, but slightly formal. He had lived in an age of hoops and minuets, when full dress was as much cultivated beyond the verge of a court as it is now sought to be abolished within it; before the remembrance of Beau Nash and his despotic sway had entirely faded; when the appellations of Sir and Madam in society were as rigidly exacted as they are of late dispensed with; and the sir Charles Grandisons of the day loved to bow low on their ladies' hands." (Ibid. 84.) He had also the other adjuncts of the old school—he was a bon-vivant—a lover of good dinners, good wine, and good stories. Of good dinners, lord Eldon used to say, "he would answer for it, that his brother had never fewer than 365 in any one year." The reflection of the Temple-hall he would often take by way of a whet for the eight o'clock banquet. As a judge, his lordship was celebrated for learned, acute, and sententious reasoning, in choice and elevated diction, arranged in nicely-balanced periods, studded with the rarest gems of classical allusions and quotations. The admiralty chair formed his task and his toy, in which he loved to expatiate before a select, and little more than drawing-room, audience. His bons mots are sometimes quoted, but, as they seem to have little pith, they must have owed their fame to his naïve and graceful execution. The following is mentioned as one of his chivalrous delicacies. When a late celebrated duchess bantered the consistory judge, and inquired, "How his court would manage if he himself should be guilty of a faux-pas?" he answered, with gallantry becoming the question, "That the idea of such an embarrassing situation had only occurred to him since he had become acquainted with her grace." Upon the whole, the late lord was among the most fortunate of his contemporaries. His benevolence was limited to self and kin; and, undisturbed in his course by any cosmopolitan sympathies, he reached the goal, and, with few mortifying delays, happily dropt into the sphere suited to his taste, education, and talents.

30. Trial of Fieschi, who fired the infernal machine (see p. 379), and his accomplices, Morey, Pepin, Boireau, and Bescher, began before the French chamber of peers. During the first two days of the trial Fieschi laboured to make it appear that he had aimed at the king's life from no private or political motive, but merely because Pepin and Morey had hired him to do it. His revelations, however, were little to be relied upon, as his excessive vanity seemed nearly allied to insanity. The manner in which he absorbed the attention of the press gave him great satisfaction. He was evidently a dissolute ruffian, carried away by no mistaken enthusiasm, religious or republican, but actuated by a mere desire of making so many francs by a reckless assassination. The proceedings lasted a fortnight. On February 15th the court sentenced Fieschi to be put to death as a parricide—that is, to be conducted to the scaffold barefooted, and covered with a shroud, and Pepin and Morey to be guillotined in the usual way. Boireau was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, and Bescher was acquitted. The three executions took place on the 19th, in the presence of a vast multitude of spectators, but without any disturbance. No discoveries of any general importance were obtained in the course of the trial. It appears, however, that Morey, who was a staunch republican, was the contriver of the whole plot; and that Fieschi was engaged in it, on account of his mechanical ingenuity and knowledge of the use of fire-arms.

Feb. 3. A new silver coin of the value of four-pence issued.

4. PARLIAMENT opened by the king in person. The royal speech was remarkable for the number, variety, and importance of its announcements, and seemed to prognosticate a session of unusual legislative activity. After the usual assurances of the maintenance of friendly relations abroad; regrets at the continuance of the civil contest in the northern provinces of Spain, and the expression of a hope of a successful result to our mediation between France and the United States, the king adverted to the domestic condition of the empire. The state of commerce, and manufactures was admitted to be highly satisfactory, but difficulties continued to press on agriculture which deserved consideration. Attention was directed to measures that would be submitted for increasing the efficiency of the church, for the computation of tithes, and for alleviating the grievances of dissenters. The necessity of maintaining the maritime strength of the country, and of giving adequate protection to commerce, had occasioned an increase in the naval estimates. Improvements in the administration of justice were recommended, especially in the court of chancery; a just settlement of tithes in Ireland; a remedy to defects in the municipal corporations of Ireland, founded on the same principles as the municipal acts passed for England and Scotland. Finally, the condition of the poor of Ireland was alluded to, and an intimation thrown out that the experience afforded of the "salutary effect" of the poor-law amendment act in England, might guide them in their approaches to this difficult subject. In both houses amendments were moved to the ministerial address, by the duke of Wellington and sir R. Peel, with a view of availing a specific pledge to reform the corporations of Ireland on the same principles as those of Britain had been reformed. In the upper house, where opposition by ministers would have been unavailing, the amendment was agreed to without a division, after some remarks from lords Melbourne and Lansdowne. In the commons the house divided, when the original address was carried by 284 against 243. Lord Stanley voted with sir R. Peel in this division.

8. The paragraph relating to agricultural distress in the king's speech having been read, lord John Russell moved for a select committee to inquire into the causes of the depression of that interest. His lordship, however, confessed that he did not anticipate any satisfactory result from the investigation. It appears that the principal problem to be solved is, why the price of wheat is at present so much lower than it used to be, in relation to the price of barley; but, if this be an evil, it is one that is likely to puzzle parliament to cure. The landed interest was left to solve the difficulty in their own way, for the proposition of county to town members in the committee was nearly four to one. The committee sat four months, but was unable to agree to a report, and merely laid before the house the evidence they had taken.

9. Lord John Russell brought forward the cabinet plan for the commutation of tithes in England. It became an act of parliament, of which an outline is given, at the end of the session, Aug. 20.

11. A deputation waited upon lord Melbourne to ask for the entire abolition of the newspaper-stamp. Dr. Birkbeck, Mr. Clume, Colonel Thompson, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Grote, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Wallace, and Mr. Buckingham spoke in favour of the measure, and lord Melbourne, after alluding to the importance of the question as it affected the pursuits and opinions of the people, said that the reasons adduced in favour of abolition should meet with serious attention.

A war had been for some time vigorously carried on against the stamp, by the open sale in the streets and elsewhere of unstamped newspapers. Hetherington, Cleave, and other London vendors had been convicted in repeated penalties for the sale of unstamped newspapers. The vendors of unstamped newspapers in the large provincial towns had also been subjected to prosecutions, and many were convicted and imprisoned.

12. Lord John Russell submitted to the house of commons two measures of great importance, and which were anxiously expected by the country; the first, a bill for a general registration of marriages, births and deaths; the second, a bill for the amendment of the marriage laws. They both became statutes, and a notice of them is given, Aug. 20.

16. Mutual and disgusting atrocities continue to disgrace the civil war in Spain. A Carlist partisan, named Cabrera, had taken prisoners and shot two constitutional alcaldes, or magistrates, and committed other acts of vengeance of the same kind. Unable to catch this insurgent, the brigadier commandant general of Lower Aragon ordered the execution of his mother, and the arrest of his three sisters, who were living quietly in the town of Tortosa. The governor of Tortosa, revolting at the idea of shooting a defenceless old woman to expiate atrocities committed by her son, delayed the execution, until positive orders came from Mina, the captain-general for the queen in Catalonia, that the deed should be done. Accordingly at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 16th inst. the señora Cabrera was shot! Her three daughters, with their husbands, and many near relations, were detained in close confinement.

The case of Mr. O'Connell, and his alleged engagement to procure a seat in the house for Mr. Raphael, as one of the representatives of the county of Carlow, for the sum of 2000*l.*, was brought before the commons by Mr. Hardy, and a select committee appointed to investigate the transaction. The report of the committee was a complete acquittal of Mr. O'Connell.

17. The claims of the maritime officers of the East India Company, who, not having been on actual service within five years prior to August, 1833, were excluded from compensation by the board of directors,—were this day negatived in a court of proprietors by a majority of 25. About 500 proprietors voted.

18. Lord Morpeth introduced the ministerial bill for the establishment of a constabulary force in Ireland,* being nearly the same measure which was last session thrown out by the lords. The bill proposes to take the appointment of petty constables out of the hands of the local magistracy, and to place it in those of the lord-lieutenant; a change which sir R. Peel, in the peculiar state of Ireland, thought expedient. After this a committee was appointed, on the motion of Mr. C. Buller, to inquire into the conduct of the commissioners of public records, and into the state of these records. Resolutions were next moved by Mr. Ward, and agreed to, for taking down the names of members on divisions, and obtaining an authentic record of the votes of the house. An animated discussion ensued on the subject of tithes, to which a motion by Mr. Sheil, for a return of the number of tithe-processes issued by the court of exchequer in Ireland, in 1835-6, gave rise. Mr. sergeant Jackson moved that the return should also include the number of orders issued by the government to the police to assist in the collection of tithe, which was agreed to.

19. The chancellor of the exchequer announced in the commons that lord Sidmouth, who had been in possession of a pension of 3000*l.* a-year, secured to him by act of parliament for public services, had voluntarily resigned his title. His lordship had obtained a large increase of income by the recent death of his father-in-law, lord Stowell.

Lord Dudley Stuart moved for the production of a copy of the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi. (See July 8, 1833.) The object of his lordship was to impress upon the house a sense of the danger to be apprehended from the encroaching spirit of Russian policy; among the past achievements of which he reckoned the formation of the German commercial league; and whose ultimate designs he considered as comprehending not only the conquest of Turkey, of Persia, and of India, but the acquisition also of further influence and dominion towards the west, by the gradual envelopment of Austria, of Prussia, and of Italy. Lord Palmerston and Mr. Poulett Thomson, who replied to his lordship, treated these apprehensions as visionary, and expressed their convictions that there was nothing in the conduct or intentions of the czar to excite either hostility or alarm on the part of this country. The German commercial league they spoke of as more likely to be beneficial than injurious to our commerce and manufactures. It may be also noticed that Mr. Thomson, in the course of his speech, took occasion to characterize the alleged Russian state papers, that had recently been published under the title of the "Portfolio," as absurd impositions. Motion agreed to.

20. Rev. Doctor Hampden gazetted as regius professor of divinity at Oxford, in the room of Dr. Burton, deceased. His appointment produced considerable excitement at Oxford for some time, his theological opinions having been affirmed by his opponents not to be orthodox. The professor's inaugural address, March 17, contained satisfactory proof of the fallacy of this notion.

22. The Moniteur contains the list of the new French ministry, of which M. Thiers is the head. In alluding to the change in the chambers, the premier said no alteration would be made in the policy which the French cabinet had followed since the death of Casimir Perier, and which policy accords with that pursued by the reform ministry in England.

23. House of lords occupied this evening by a debate on the subject of the late appointments of borough magistrates by lord John Russell, on the recommendation of the new town-councils, to which the attention of the house was called by lord Wharncliffe. As was to be expected, and as, indeed, may be considered to have been unavoidable in the circumstances, the names submitted to government by the town-councils for appointments to the magistracy have in general been exclusively those of persons belonging to the party of the majority of the council: there have been a few cases of exception, in which the majority has not exercised its powers to the full extent, but there can be no doubt that for the most part the opposite course has been taken. In various instances, it appears that the controlling authority of the home secretary has been applied to correct this rigorous partisanship, by the substitution of other names for those in the lists. Usually, however, in conformity with the pledge he gave publicly last session in parliament, he has adopted, without any alteration, the names submitted by the council. Time it is hoped will remedy this defect, and it is desirable that it should, as it is the very essence of the representative principle in politics, that a due representation of the minority as well as the majority should be secured.

23. Mr. Buckingham's compensation bill for losses sustained in India was thrown out of the commons by a majority of 118 against 46.

29. Mr. Sergeant O'Loughlin moved in the commons the second reading of the Irish municipal reform bill. It was attended to give to the seven large towns of Dublin, Limerick, Belfast, Kilkenny, Waterford, Cork, and Galway, a constituency for electing the town-council, comprising the occupiers of all houses of the value of 10*l*.; and in all the other boroughs of those occupying houses of the value of 5*l*. Sir Robert Peel said he would not support the maintenance of the present corporations, but he would not consent to the substitution of other corporations.

AFFAIR OF CRACOW.—This ancient Polish city, with a strip of surrounding territory, was erected into an independent state by the congress of Vienna in 1815; all the allied powers, England among them, guaranteeing its rights and independence. As such a small state was insufficient to support a king and court, Cracow was allowed to govern itself according to republican forms, and in this posture matters continued till the Polish insurrection of 1830 and its unfortunate results, one of which was the wholesale proscription of the Poles of the duchy of Warsaw by the emperor Nicholas. As an independent state, many of the Polish exiles thought they might safely take up their residence in Cracow. The three great partitioners of Poland, however, felt uneasy at the concentration of so many Poles in the centre of their spoiliations. Russia, Austria, and Prussia, jointly complained of the protection afforded to the Poles; accused them of conspiring to re-establish the Polish kingdom, and of being guilty of disorder in Cracow itself. They demanded their expulsion from the republic, or, if not promptly complied with, threatened to march troops into its territories. Accordingly, in February, Russian and Austrian troops were marched into a state which had a formal guarantee from the Vienna congress that no foreign armament should ever violate its territory.

March 4. The navy estimates, being laid before the commons, exhibited an increase of expenditure compared with those of last year of 287,000*l*., occasioned by the employment of 5000 additional seamen. Ministers defended the augmentation as necessary to the protection of commerce, and allusions were made by different members to the menacing or ambiguous attitude of Russia.

11. Lord Howick, in bringing forward the army estimates, in which there was a reduction of charge, moved that the number of men to be maintained, exclusive of those in the East Indies, do not exceed 81,319. Mr. Hume moved a reduction of 5000 men, which was negatived by 136 to 43. Sir W. Molesworth next moved that the foot guards be put, in respect of pay, on the same scale as infantry of the line, which would effect a saving of 9000*l*. a-year, but the amendment was rejected by 217 against 43.

15. NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTY.—Chancellor of the exchequer announced the intentions of the government in respect of the stamp-duties, especially of the stamp on newspapers, which last had for some time excited a strong interest in the public mind. It was proposed, he stated, to revise the whole of the present law respecting stamp-duties; first by consolidating into one statute the 150 acts of parliament over which the law was at present distributed; secondly, by the apportionment of the various rates on a new principle—namely, by the simple and uniform rule of making the price of the stamp in every case correspond to the pecuniary value involved in the transaction for which it is required. The effect of this change would be to reduce the stamp-duty upon indentures of apprenticeship, bills of lading, and many others of the more common instruments, and to increase it somewhat upon mortgages and conveyances of large amounts of property; but it was not expected that it would make much difference upon the entire produce of the duties. The consolidation act which was in preparation, it was intimated, would contain no fewer than 330 sections; but it was suggested by some members that it might probably be a more convenient plan to divide all this matter into a short series of acts, one for each class of stamp-duties. With regard to the stamp on newspapers, Mr. Rice stated that it was proposed to reduce it from its present amount of 4*d.* with the discount to 1*d.* without discount. This would be a reduction of exactly 2½*d.* on all newspapers sold for 7*d.* or less, and of 2¼*d.*, or rather more than 2½*d.* on all sold for more than 7*d.* A portion varying between two-thirds and three-fourths of the whole tax would thus be remitted. To this remission parliament assented, by which the illicit circulation of unstamped newspapers, which had long been followed, was at once rendered so profitless as to be entirely abandoned. Some members were opposed to the retention of the penny stamp, considering it the duty of government to remove every obstacle to the diffusion of political information. But this would have made a postage necessary, to which the newspaper proprietors were opposed as practically inconvenient; and which, moreover, would have been a virtually a tax on the country reader of a London newspaper, from which the town reader would have been exempt. The transmission of papers at the public expense, without either stamp or postage, appeared an inadmissible proposition. It would have evinced a desire to spread political intelligence to the exclusion of literature and science. Some were in favour of the repeal of the duties on paper, in lieu of the stamp-duty on newspapers. The reduction of the newspaper-tax was the only proposition of Mr. Rice on the stamp-duties that was carried.

22. Lord John Hay, commander of the British naval squadron stationed off the northern coast of Spain, intimated to general Cordova that he had received orders from the British government to co-operate with the queen's army on that part of the coast.

28. Third reading of the Irish municipal bill carried in the commons by 260 against 199. The debate was protracted, in which the chief speakers were Mr. Ward, sir R. Inglis, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Shiel, and sir R. Peel.

April 7. DEATH OF WILLIAM GODWIN. —This eminent writer was in the 81st year of his age. He was born at Wisbeach, and was neither the eldest nor youngest of a large family. Both his father and grandfather were dissenting ministers, and William himself became a preacher at Stowmarket, after attending five years, under the tuition of doctors Rees and Kippin, the Dissenting College, Hoxton. In 1783 he laid aside the clerical character and removed to London, determined to apply himself to literature as a profession. His first work was a volume of sermons, called "Sketches of History," published in 1784. He next was engaged on the "New Annual Register," from which he derived a small but certain income. The political convulsions of France soon after followed, and into this vortex Godwin was carried, and from which he never entirely escaped. His "Inquiry into Political Justice," which was hastily written in sixteen months, appeared in 1793, and attracted much popular attention from the boldness and novelty of its doctrines. It is a transcript of the opinions which the stormy period of its birth had revealed, and offers the singular anomaly of seeking to establish the empire of reason by the abrogation of those social guarantees which reason has slowly elaborated from the waste of barbarism: its tendency is to exalt the natural above the civilized man. In a second edition the author corrected some of his extravagances, but left sufficient to show that his mind was not of the inductive cast. He is eloquent and impassioned, but superficial, and evidently without the powers of intellectual analysis and combination essential to the successful investigation of ethical and political philosophy. Thus he appears to have discovered, and he subsequently applied himself to biography, history, and the composition of works of imagination. In 1797 he married Mary Wollstonecraft, one of the most remarkable characters of her time; and who, to a mind of masculine strength and independence, united a kind and affectionate heart. The union, which was happy and congenial in sentiment, was of short duration, Mrs. Godwin dying within a few months after giving birth to the present Mrs. Shelley, the authoress of "Frankenstein." In 1801 Mr. Godwin again married an accomplished widow lady, who survived him. For some years he was occupied in business as a bookseller, and under the name of Edward Baldwin issued various little works for the entertainment and instruction of young persons. But it will be seen, from the date of his publications among the "Men of Letters" of the present reign, that his more serious literary labours were never long suspended. During his life he had the gratification of associating with some of the most distinguished of his contemporaries, Fox, Sheridan, Macintosh, Holcroft, Grattan, Walter Scott, and Curran, the last his particular friend, whom, in 1800, he visited in Ireland. Mr. Godwin says of himself that he was "constitutionally meditative;" but his bland courtesy and placid aspect only imperfectly indicated the fire and animation of his intellect. His biographies and History of the Commonwealth have the great merits of fidelity, accuracy, and careful research. His novels are among the best in the language, and fully reach one of the chief ends of such compositions, in keeping up excitement and unrelaxed interest. The incidents, however, are sometimes repulsive, and some of the characters, though nobly and chivalrously conceived, border on the extravagant. His style is rapid, transparent, and spirited; his descriptive scenes graphic, vivid, and glowing, especially those of domestic love, and feminine grace or beauty. It is high testimony to the wisdom and benevolence of Mr. Godwin's character, that he always cherished lofty sentiments on the virtues and destiny of his species. The sum he received for his "Political Justice" was 700*l.*; for "Caleb Williams," 84*l.*; "St. Leon," 400 guineas. A few of his last years were made comfortable by an appointment which he received, during the administration of earl Grey, to the sinecure of yeoman usher of the exchequer. The apartments he occupied in New Palace Yard, and where he died, have been lately pulled down to make way for local improvements.

8. A little after midnight the equestrian statue of king William the Third on College-green, Dublin, was blown up by gunpowder. The statue stood on a pedestal eighteen feet in height, surrounded by an enclosure of iron railing, the summit of the statue being about thirty feet from the level of the street. The figure was of lead, and, though weighing several tons, was blown up some distance in the air, and fell a few paces distant from the pedestal. The authors of the plot have not been discovered, and the Orangemen are much disconcerted by this abrupt ejection of the idol of faction.

16. Duel between señors Isturitz and Mendizabal at Madrid, in consequence of an altercation in the chamber of deputies. No harm was done, and Isturitz retracted the expression deemed offensive by his opponent.

19. Mr. D. W. Harvey's motion for a revision of the pension-list negatived by 268 against 146.

25. Ministerial plan for the settlement of tithes in Ireland brought forward by lord Morpeth. His lordship stated that the present measure differed from that introduced last year, principally in an arrangement being now made, by which no parochial benefice would be altogether suppressed. In all parishes where the number of resident protestants was below 50, the incumbent should have an income of 100*l.*; the income would rise with the number of protestants, but no parochial living would be above 500*l.* in annual value. According to this scheme, the annual remuneration to the clergy would amount to 361,938*l.* This sum was of course to be obtained from the tithes, which it was proposed to commute into a perpetual rent-charge, payable by the owner of the first estate of inheritance, a deduction being made from the present amount of the burden to the extent of 30 per cent. This, it was calculated, would afford a revenue of 459,550*l.*; so that the difference between the receipt and expenditure would be 97,612*l.* His lordship observed that the government felt they could not abandon the engagements they had made on entering office, and that therefore they still adhered to the principle of what was called the appropriation clause in the bill of last year, and should propose that if, in the future disposition of the revenues of the Irish church, any portion of them should appear to be superfluous for the uses of the members of her community, it should, after the satisfaction of all existing interests, be applied to the religious and moral instruction of the whole Irish people. Preliminary resolution agreed to.

26. The lords assembled in great force to do execution, as threatened, upon the Irish municipal bill. On the order of the day being moved for the house to resolve itself into a committee on the bill, lord Fitzgerald, in a long speech, moved "That it be an instruction to the committee to make provision for the abolition of the corporations, and for such arrangements as may be necessary, on their abolition, for securing the efficient and impartial execution of justice, and the peace and good government of cities and towns in Ireland." The principal speakers in the debate that followed were, in support of the motion, lords Abinger and Lyndhurst; and, in opposition to it, the lord chancellor and lords Holland and Melbourne. Their lordships divided at near one o'clock in the morning, when the numbers were found to be—for lord Fitzgerald's motion, 203 (including 70 proxies); against it, 119 (including 47 proxies). After this triumph, lord Lansdowne intimated that the bill was abandoned by ministers to the nursing of lord Lyndhurst.

In the commons Mr. Rippon moved, and Mr. Gillon seconded, a resolution, "That the attendance of the bishops in parliament is prejudicial to the cause of religion." Ayes, 53; noes, 180.

27. The great strength of the landed interest in the commons was shown on the motion of the marquis of Chandos:—"That in the application of any surplus revenue towards the relief of the burdens of the country, either by remission of taxation or otherwise, due regard should be had to the necessity of a portion thereof being applied to the relief of the agricultural interest." Lord John Russell, in opposing the motion, pointed out the various ways in which the burdens of the proprietors and cultivators of the soil had been of late years diminished, and dwelt especially upon the important relief which it was unanimously agreed they had obtained through the new poor-law. The result, however, of this first side-blow aimed at the proposed reductions of the newspaper stamp and the paper duty, was calculated to give rise to some apprehension as to the fate of these propositions of enlightened policy; for Lord Chandos's motion was only negatived by a majority of 208 to 172. Thus, in a house of 380 members, the exertion of all the strength of government appeared to be able to beat the combination of the landlords by no greater a majority than 36; and on this occasion both sir Robert Peel, lord Stanley, and sir James Graham deserted the opposition, and voted with ministers against the motion.

28. In the lords, the lord Chancellor explained his plan for the regulation of his own office, as contained in two bills which he presented, the one to provide for the better administration of justice in the court of chancery, the other respecting the appellate jurisdiction of their lordships. Both bills were thrown out on the second reading.

During the months of February, March, and April, the sees of Durham, Ely, Lichfield and Coventry, Killaloe, and Clonfert, became vacant by the deaths of their respective bishops.

May 3. Mr. Grantley Berkeley moved in the commons, that ladies be admitted to hear the debates. Ayes, 132; noes, 90. However, when the chancellor of the exchequer moved for a grant of 400*l.* to carry this chivalrous vote into effect, it was refused by 42 to 28, chiefly from the opposition of the speaker. In the old house of commons, ladies used to be admitted to hear the debates over the ventilator.

5. Fortified works, which had cost the Carlists three or four months to erect, and through the centre of which ran the high road to Hernani, were gallantly carried by the English auxiliary legion under general Evans. Two armed steamers, commanded by lord John Hay, which by a well-directed fire opened a passage through the enemy's works, lent very opportune aid to the victors. The loss of the British in killed and wounded amounted to 800, among whom were 70 or 80 officers. The Carlist general was killed.

6. The chancellor of the exchequer brought forward the budget, and entered into a detail on the prosperous state of the country. He said that the income of the current financial year was 46,980,000*l.*, and the expenditure 46,318,000*l.*, leaving a surplus of 662,000*l.* With this surplus he proposed to reduce the duty on first-class paper, from 3*d.* to 1*d.*, and to abolish altogether the duty on stained paper; to remit the South Sea duties, amounting to 10,000*l.*; to reduce the duties on insurances of farming stock, on taxed carts, and on newspapers. The total amount of the repeals which he proposed he estimated at 351,000*l.* for the present year, and 520,000*l.* when they should all come into operation.

9. The lords went into committee on the Irish municipal bill, when an amendment, moved by lord Lyndhurst on the second clause, which raised the whole question between the plan of the reform of the corporations, as proposed by ministers, and that simply of abolition brought forward by the opposition, was, after an animated debate, carried on a division, by a majority of 107 to 53. All the rest of the clauses to the 21st inclusive were then struck out, on the motion of lord Lyndhurst, except the 3d and 10th, which were agreed to.

12. Mr. Clay in an able speech moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the operation of the act permitting the establishment of joint-stock banks. The chancellor of the exchequer expressed his concurrence in the motion, and stated that the government would take upon itself the appointment of the committee.

16. Committee appointed to try the validity of the return of Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Ruthven for Dublin reported that they had not been duly elected. Mr. O'Connell, foreseeing the issue of this inquiry, had provided himself with another seat, by one of his friends accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, and he appeared during the remainder of the session as member for Kilkenny.

Mendizabal, the Spanish prime minister, from whose abilities much had been anticipated, resigned in consequence of the queen's refusal that generals Quesada, Espeleta, and San Roman should be superseded in the commands they held in Madrid. He had not been zealously supported by the cortes. M. Isturitz succeeded him.

28. Sir Francis Head, the new governor of Upper Canada, dissolved the house of assembly. In April the house had stopped the supplies as a means of obtaining redress for the alleged grievances of the province. Sir Francis had declared at the outset of his government, that his instructions were such, that an elective legislative council could not be granted, and what were called the crown reserves would not be abandoned, except on condition of an adequate and permanent civil list being voted. The result of the dissolution apparently afforded a triumph to the governor; out of 64 members returned, only 18 belonged to the radical party, the remaining 44 disapproving of their proceedings.

June 1. On the second reading of the Irish tithe bill, lord Stanley moved an amendment, the object of which was to get rid of the appropriation clause, and preserve to the church undiminished its revenues. The discussion lasted three nights, during which all the leading members on both sides addressed the house. Lord Stanley intimated that the adoption of his amendment would obtain for the ministerial bill the support of those whose co-operation never could nor would be otherwise obtained. Lord John Russell, in reply, contended that, in legislating for Ireland, it was necessary to consult the interests and feelings of the great body of the people. The real question in controversy, both in regard to the church and corporations, in the future government of Ireland, was, whether the old protestant ascendancy, or the national interests, shall be consulted. On the other hand, it was urged, by a third class of reasoners, that the ministers' bill was weak and remote from a final settlement. If, for example, according to their own position, the church of Ireland were in future to be regulated according to the prevailing taste of a majority of its inhabitants, the mere abstraction, as proposed, of 90,000*l.* from its present revenues would not attain that object. It can only be viewed as the first instalment of a much larger debt of justice due to the catholic population. At a quarter past three o'clock on the morning of Saturday, the house divided:—for lord Stanley's amendment, 261, against it, 300. Lord John Russell's bill was then read a second time.

1. A numerous meeting of the friends of Mr. O'Connell held at the Crown and Anchor, for the purpose of commencing a subscription to indemnify him for the expenses to which he had been put in defending his seat for Dublin. Nearly 3000*l.* was subscribed at the meeting, and the subscription ultimately reached near 9000*l.*

6. Died at Pilitz, in his 82nd year, ANTHONY CLEMENT THEODORE, king of Saxony. He succeeded his brother Frederick Augustus in 1827, and he is now in his turn succeeded by a nephew, who since 1830 had been associated with him in the government, under the title of regent. This interesting but limited state has had but little influence in the affairs of Germany since the congress of Vienna, when, in punishment for Frederick Augustus having been the last to quit Napoleon and join the allies, a million of the Saxon people, who had all along disapproved of his tergiversations and devotion to the French, were given over to Prussia, and the territories they occupied (about half of the kingdom) incorporated with the Prussian dominions. Since then the king of Prussia has exercised an influence over the whole, and recently Saxony has been induced to become a party to the German trade-league. Thus the people have paid dearly for the fault of their ruler, and yet, according to M. de Talleyrand, the only fault to be attributed to the old king, in not seceding from Buonaparte quite so soon as some other allies of the French, was his having allowed his clock to be a quarter of an hour slower than his neighbours.

13. IRISH MUNICIPAL BILL.—The greater part of the clauses in the Irish municipal bill, which had been struck out by the lords, were restored in the commons with merely verbal alterations. A conference next took place, without satisfactory result. On the 30th the subject was resumed in the commons, and several members strongly animadverted on the constitution of the house of lords, in reference to the exercise of its legislative power. In a discussion in the lords on the 27th, earl Grey threw out a novel suggestion for effecting a compromise between the supporters and opponents of the Bill. His lordship's suggestion was, that every voter should be restricted to voting for only a half or five-eighths, or other fixed proportion of the whole number of town councillors, so that no party could be established to the entire exclusion of the rest,—but a minority, of whatever persuasion it might be, would always retain a proportionate share of influence in municipal government. The idea was only imperfectly understood. It failed to reconcile differences between the houses, and the bill fell to the ground.

20. DEATH OF ABBE SIEYES.—This venerable artiste of political constitutions died at Paris in his 88th year. At the commencement of the great revolution he was grand-vicar to the bishop of Chartres, and acquired celebrity by his writings. In a book which gave a powerful impulse to the public mind, he asked this question: "What is the tiers-état?" And he answered, "Nothing."—"What ought it to be?"—"Everything." M. Dumont, who knew the Abbé at this time, describes him as a shy, absent, dreaming man, who lived much in solitude, and thought he had completely mastered the science of government. He was successively a member of the national assembly, the national convention, a director, and consul, and, on the fall of the republic, became a count and peer of the empire. On the return of the Bourbons, he was proscribed for having voted for "la mort sans pitié" of Louis XVI. His proscription, as well as that of others, was removed under Louis Philip, on which Sieyès returned to France. He was one of those men who, in ages of enthusiasm, found a sect, and, in an age of intelligence, exercise the ascendant of a powerful understanding. The progress and composition of civil society formed his favourite subjects of contemplation. Although cool and deliberate, he had the ardour which inspires the investigation of truth, and the fearlessness to insist on its promulgation. The leading characteristic of his mind was concatenation, that is to say, the strict connexion of his own ideas. Like Jeremy Bentham, he was on the best understanding with himself; but he neither harmonized with existing realities, nor with minds different from his own. Hence it was not wonderful that, though this able Frenchman made fifty constitutions, he never hit upon the practicable and right one. His patterns were cut to his own cogitations, irrespective of living interests, opinions, and usages. He thought the British constitution of three estates mere charlatanerie, which was the natural conclusion of a philosopher who conceived society ought to be uniform without distinction of classes. Notwithstanding his proneness to abstraction, he had the energy in particular emergencies of practical conceptions, as was instanced in the overthrow of the directory in 1799, which was planned by him and executed by Napoleon. Sieyès was avaricious, but just. He lost the favour of the first revolutionists by resisting the confiscation of church tithe without compensation to the present owners.

22. Trial in the Court of Common Pleas, in which lord Melbourne, first lord of the treasury, was defendant, and Mr. Norton, one of the police justices of the metropolis, was plaintiff. The trial related to alleged criminalities between his lordship and Mrs. Norton, grand-daughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

23. Died at Kensington, in his 63rd year, JAMES MILL, the historian of British India. He was a native of Kincardineshire, and studied at Edinburgh. He was licensed as a preacher in the Scotch church, and came to London as a tutor in the family of Sir John Stuart, one of the barons of the exchequer in Scotland, on whose estate his father occupied a farm. He did not return to Scotland, but remained in the metropolis, where he devoted himself to literary and philosophical pursuits. The work by which he first became known to the public is the History of British India, published in 1818. It is not distinguished by beauties of style or narration, which the philosophic turn of the author might deem secondary objects in his undertaking; but abounds with enlarged and liberal views in politics, political economy, and legislation; and, by its high estimation with individuals exercising authority over that vast empire, has beneficially influenced the course of oriental administration. Of Mr. Mill it has been said, "he was a man of extensive and profound learning, thoroughly imbued with the doctrines of ethical and metaphysical science, conversant above most men with the writings of the ancient philosophers, whose language he familiarly knew, and gifted with extraordinary powers of application, which had made quite natural to him a life of severe and unremitting study." (Lord Brougham's Speeches, ii. 394.) He was not remarkable for originality of mind, but possessed a talent for giving a mathematical form, if not mathematical certainty, to the generalities of Bentham and other writers. It is thus that he has arrived at an apparent demonstration of the verity of some of Mr. Ricardo's fallacies in his "Elements of Political Economy;" and in his celebrated article on Government, inserted in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, he assumes that self-interest is the chief, if not the sole, actuating motive of mankind. It is only by attaching a meaning to the word remote from the ordinary, that this repulsive proposition is wrought out, and the conclusion, after all, seems mixed up with error; for it is folly and ignorance, rather than selfishness, that have done so much mischief in the world. Man is the most disinterested of all animals; most intent on the pursuit of objects foreign to his well-being; and the most pressing end of philosophy and legislation seems to be, to draw him from the "shadows vain," on which he is and always has been occupied, to matters really essential to his happiness. Mr. Mill sustained a high character among his contemporaries, and was eminently independent in sentiment and conduct. By his death society has lost one of its most useful instructors. He fell a victim of consumption, after nearly a year of lingering illness, during which he was disabled from attending the duties of his office of chief examiner to the East India Company.

25. A young man, named Louis Alibaud, fired at the French king with a walking-stick gun, as the king was passing in his carriage from the Tuileries. No injury was done, the ball lodging in the roof of the carriage. When Louis Philip was congratulated on his escape, he is reported to have said, "Henry IV. escaped twenty-two attempts of the kind, and was murdered by the twenty-third!" Alibaud was an enthusiastic republican in poverty. He had no accomplice, and was tried by the court of peers, July 8, and guillotined on the 11th.

30. Death of James Madison, one of the leading men of the United States in the infancy of the republic. He succeeded Mr. Jefferson in the presidency.

July 6. In a letter inserted in the Dublin Pilot, Mr. O'Connell developed the plan for "The General Association of Ireland." Its objects were—1. To procure by law a complete municipal reform in Ireland, on as large and effectual a basis as that originally proposed by the ministry. 2. To secure by law such a settlement of the tithe question as shall be fully satisfactory to the people of Ireland. In a second letter, he strongly urged the people to rally round the Melbourne ministry, and the government of lord Mulgrave in Ireland.

8. ENGLISH CHURCH REFORM.—Lord John Russell explained in the commons the government measures for the reform of the English church, and which were founded on four reports that had been made by the ecclesiastical commission, consisting of the principal bishops and ministers of state, and who had been first appointed under the ministry of sir R. Peel, but continued by his successors. These measures in their full scope went to a new arrangement of dioceses and their revenues; to the creation of two new bishoprics; to the appropriation of the redundant revenues of the deans and chapters to the improvement of poor livings, and to the diminution of non-residence and pluralities. Only one of the four bills intended was brought forward, namely, that respecting the sees. The house seems to have been taken by surprise, and the bill was read a second time without opposition or special notice. At this stage, the radicals evinced such a determined hostility to the ministers' scheme of church reform, that they were only able to carry the established church bill (see Aug. 20th) during the short remainder of the session. The lords eagerly adopted it, and in the commons it was supported by sir R. Peel and Mr. O'Connell.

15. Mr. Warburton moved for a select committee to consider the case of Catherine Robson and Isabella Ainslie, claiming to be the heirs of Samuel Troutbeck, a merchant of Madras, who died in 1783, and whose property, which, in 1814, amounted to upwards of 140,000*l.*, had been taken possession of by the crown. Mr. Troutbeck had bequeathed his property to charitable uses in Wapping, but, owing to some defect in his testamentary disposition, the will was declared invalid by lord Eldon. Motion negatived.

DANISH CLAIMS.—Mr. Clay moved in the commons for a select committee to inquire into these claims still remaining unsatisfied. It was opposed by the chancellor of the exchequer on the authority of the law officers of the crown, and negatived. What are called the Danish claims are the claims made by British subjects on account of losses sustained by them through the measures resorted to by the Danish government, in retaliation for our sudden attack upon Copenhagen in 1807, when, without any declaration of war, we seized the Danish fleet, having previously also laid an embargo on all the Danish vessels in the Thames, which, to the number of three hundred, were afterwards sold by us with their cargoes, and produced to the Treasury a sum of nearly 1,200,000*l.* sterling. This proceeding was sought to be justified by the ministers of that period on the ground that the Danish fleet would otherwise have been delivered over to, or fallen into the hands of, the French. The Danes endeavoured to avenge the attack on their capital, by the seizure of British property wherever they could find it. This seizure was not limited, as usual in the case of war between nations, to property afloat, but extended to all goods belonging to British subjects on the soil of Denmark, and even to the confiscation of book-debts owing to British creditors, and for which the Danish government gave discharges to their merchants. Our unprovoked attack on Copenhagen was alleged to be a justification of these violations of international law. The whole property of which British subjects were deprived, in these several ways, amounted to about 546,000*l.*, belonging to some hundreds of individuals. Their losses did not arise from negligence or want of prudence on their part, or in the ordinary practice of war, but solely from the irregular proceedings of the belligerents. Upon this was grounded their claims to compensation, and, after an interval of twenty or thirty years, their justice has been partially admitted. The claims for book-debts confiscated have been satisfied, and also the second class of claimants—those who claim for goods seized on shore—are expected to be liquidated. The third class, who claim on account of ships and cargoes taken at sea, government appears inclined to resist as not of equal validity with the others. The entire amount of this last description of claims does not exceed 150,000*l*.

25. After a long debate, the lords rejected the appropriation clause in the Irish church bill by a majority of 138 to 47. See Aug. 20.

26. Armand Carrel, editor of the National, and one of the political writers who distinguished himself by the part he took in the revolution of 1830, died of a wound he had received in a duel with the editor of La Presse. His remains received a public funeral, at which men of such opposite sentiments as Chateaubriand, Arago, Lafitte, and Beranger, were present. Orations and eulogies were delivered over his grave by MM. Thibaudeau, Scheffer, and Maillifer.

28. By a vote of the commons government is authorized to guarantee one-third portion of the last instalment of the Greek loan without the consent of Russia, that power having taken advantage of an informality to withdraw from the engagement in regard to this matter she had made in conjunction with England and France. Mr. Robinson moved an amendment, declaring the inexpediency of the proposed guarantee, on the ground that the treaty of 1832 had not been fulfilled on the part of Greece, which was supported by Mr. Hume, Lord Dudley Stuart, and Dr. Bowring; but on a division the original resolution was carried by a majority of 81 to 40. The interest on the sum to be guaranteed amounts only to 12,000*l*.

Died at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in his 60th year, NATHAN MAYER ROTHSCHILD, the greatest millionaire of the present or probably any other age. The founder of the house of Rothschild, Mayer Anselm, was born at Frankfort in the Jews' alley. He was brought up with the view of making him a priest, but his occupation ultimately became commercial. He died in 1812, leaving to five sons a considerable fortune and unbounded credit. The five brothers have taken part in all the great loan transactions of England, France, Austria, and almost every country. Nathan Mayer, of London, was considered the chief of the family, though he was not the eldest. He came to England in 1800, where he acted as agent for his father in the purchase of Manchester goods for the continent. Shortly afterwards he had, through the agency of his father for the elector of Hesse Cassel and other German princes, large sums placed at his disposal, which he invested with judgment, and his means rapidly accumulated. Mr. Rothschild married, in 1806, a third daughter of Mr. Cohen, by whom he had four sons and three daughters. It was the marriage of his eldest son, Lionel, to a daughter of baron Rothschild, that called the deceased to Frankfort: he was there attacked with illness and died. The corpse of Mr. Rothschild was brought to this country, and was buried in the cemetery belonging to the great German synagogue in Duke's place.

31. ADMISSION TO THE COMMONS' GALLERY.—For a long time past the public have obtained admission as spectators to the proceedings of the houses of parliament, only by written orders of peers for the lords, and for the commons by the speaker's order to a seat below the gallery, and either by a member's order, or by the payment of half-a-crown, to the gallery. By a regulation promulgated a few weeks since, the privilege of admission to the commons' gallery by the half-crown payment is abolished, and the written order of a member is made the only passport. The chief plea for this innovation is, that it is expedient to put an end, in all cases, to the receipt of fees or gratuities by the officers of the house; a laudable aim, but in practice it seems it has had the effect of restricting (though not to the inconvenience of those who do attend) the public accommodation. The gallery has been less frequented under the new than the old system; showing that a majority of people found it easier to pay their half-crowns for admission than to procure members' orders.

PARIS.—According to the newspapers, the increase of assassinations and street-robberies in Paris is quite dreadful. These crimes, until lately, used not to be included to any great extent in the delinquencies of the French capital. The agents of the police were never so numerous as now; but it seems they are so engaged in pursuit of political offenders as to have little leisure to attend to common felons. Among the recent victims is one Mr. Nagle, an Irish gentleman, who was murdered by night, as he was returning to his residence in the Faubourg St. Germain, by two ruffians armed with large knives.

Aug. 1. Mr. Walter moved for a select committee to inquire into the operation of the new poor law, particularly in regard to out-door relief and the separation of husbands from wives, and children from their parents. Lord John Russell showed that on a comparison of the years 1834 and 1836, there was a saving in expense, in the latter year amounting to 1,794,990*l*. This was thought satisfactory, and the house rejected the motion by a majority of 82 against 46.

2. On the order of the day having been read for taking into consideration the lords' amendments to the Irish tithe bill, lord J. Russell rose, and, in an address which was loudly cheered throughout by the ministerial side of the house, moved that the further consideration of the amendments should be postponed to that day three months. The principle of appropriation, which had been rejected by the other house, his lordship described as that which gave its chief value to the bill. As for himself and his colleagues, "We are prepared," he said, "to stand upon that principle. We maintained that that principle was essential to a final settlement of the tithe question when we were out of office; and if, while we are in office, the house of commons think proper to affirm an opposite principle, amounting to a denial of that which we asserted, of course it will be our duty to resign, and to pretend no longer to govern the councils of this country." Lord John Russell was replied to by sir R. Peel, who concluded his speech by moving "that the lords' amendments be taken into consideration now." A long and animated debate followed, in which lord J. Russell's motion was supported by Mr. E. Denison, Mr. Hume, Mr. O'Loughlin, Mr. Sheil, and Mr. D. W. Harvey; and the amendment of Sir Robert Peel, by lord Sandon, sir James Graham, and lord Stanley. At half-past one o'clock the house divided, when the numbers for the original motion were 260; for Sir R. Peel's amendment, 231.

10. FREE CONFERENCE.—The houses of parliament being unable to agree on the amendments made by the lords in the Charitable trusts bill, a free conference was demanded by the commons. No free conference having been held since 1740 or 1757, the proceeding excited considerable interest. At a common conference there is no debate or verbal discussion of the points of difference: it is a mere ceremony ending in the delivery of a written paper by the messengers of the one house to those of the other. For any purpose that is answered by the meeting, the paper might be sent, as bills are, directly from the one house to the other. But at a free conference the parties, if so disposed, may discuss viva voce the points at issue. On this occasion, when lord John Russell, Mr. Hume, and some other members, met a deputation of the upper house, the conference passed off without debate; his lordship briefly stating from a paper, that the commons adhered to their dissent from the amendments of the lords, and the earl of Ripon having as briefly answered that they would receive the serious consideration of the lords, the interview terminated. Mr. Hume, who had expected a debate, waxed wroth at this mode of proceeding, and viscount Melbourne was equally dissatisfied with the reserve of lord Ripon and his associates. A second free conference ensued on the following day, when there was a regular debate, which lasted upwards of an hour, but ended with the opinions of each party remaining unchanged. No agreement having been come to, the lords left the disputed bill with the commons.

17. Lord John Russell announced in the commons that the whole of the 246 convicts from Hampshire who had been transported for rioting in 1831 (see p. 90) had been pardoned, with the exception only of ten, who were undergoing punishment for offences committed in the colonies.

18. Lord Lyndhurst, in moving for a return stating what had been the fate of each of the bills introduced into either house of parliament in the course of the session, took an opportunity of entering at great length into the defence of the conduct which had been pursued by himself and his friends, and also of delivering a parting philippic against the general policy of the administration. The oration of the learned lord gave rise, of course, to some debate, in which lord Holland, lord Melbourne, and the lord chancellor took part on the one side, and the duke of Wellington on the other. The motion was agreed to.

A royal order of this date has been issued from the court at Windsor, for the moral discipline of the army. It takes effect in respect of soldiers enlisted on or after Sept. 1, 1836, and provides that soldiers who have completed seven years service shall be entitled to 1*d.* per day extra, and to wear a ring of lace round the right arm, if their names have not been entered in the Regimental Defaulters' Book for at least two years preceding. Further additional pay and more rings, under similar terms, at the end of 14 and 21 years' service.

20. PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. Hume was in the middle of some inculpatory observations on the obstructive proceedings of the lords during the session, when he was interrupted by the entrance of the usher of the black rod to summon the members to the upper house to hear the prorogation speech of the king. His majesty congratulated parliament on the important measures of legislation that had been completed during the session. The diminution of crime in Ireland was adverted to, and confidence expressed that perseverance in a just and impartial government would tend to preserve tranquillity, and to develop her great natural resources. The flourishing state of commerce and manufactures was admitted to be gratifying, provided it was accompanied with that prudence and caution essential to its permanence. Parliament was then prorogued in the usual form by the lord chancellor.

At the close of the session, complaints arose that it had not been so remarkable for effective legislation as in preceding years under the reform ministry. The Irish tithes and municipal bills, and the bill for governing charitable trusts in England by popular election, were lost through the inability of the commons to agree in the amendments of the lords. Among minor failures, was the loss or abandonment of bills for amending the English municipal act, for improving the court of chancery, for disfranchising the borough of Stafford, for removing the civil disabilities of the Jews, and for shortening the duration of county elections. Notwithstanding these miscarriages, important measures were matured, very creditable to parliamentary industry, and of which a brief outline may be given.

By the act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales, provision is made for the final extinction within two years of the vexatious right of exacting tithes in kind, and for commuting them into a corn rent-charge, payable in money, according to the value of a fixed quantity of corn, as yearly ascertained by the average of the preceding seven years. If the parties cannot, under certain regulations, agree among themselves upon a permanent commutation before Oct. 1, 1838, commissioners are to proceed to make an award, founded upon the ascertained value of the tithe for the seven years preceding Christmas, 1835, which shall be binding for ever after. Thus the chief practical objection to tithe—namely, that it is a tax upon the application of capital to the improvement of the soil, is removed, the right hitherto enjoyed by the tithe-owner, of increasing his demands according to the augmented value or produce of the land, being taken away.

Next after this measure is another, which was less popular, called the Established Church Act, by which the heads of the church and certain ministers of state are incorporated for effecting a new distribution of episcopal dioceses and incomes. Under this statute the bishopric of Bristol is to be united to that of Gloucester, that of St. Asaph to that of Bangor; and that of Sodor and Man to that of Chester, and two new bishoprics are to be erected, one at Manchester and the other at Ripon. The income of the archbishop of Canterbury is to be reduced to 15,000*l.*; that of the archbishop of York to 10,000*l.*; that of the bishop of London to 10,000*l.*; that of the bishop of Durham to 8000*l.*; that of the bishop of Winchester to 7000*l.*; that of the bishop of Ely to 5500*l.*; that of the bishop of St. Asaph and Bangor to 5200*l.*; and that of the bishop of Worcester to 5000*l.* These reductions amount altogether to a sum of about 28,500*l.* per annum. The other bishops are to have incomes varying from 4000*l.* to 5000*l.* No ecclesiastical dignity or benefice is to be in future granted to any bishop to be held in commendam. These regulations, it is expected, will lessen translations by leaving only three or four sees objects of temptation. Acts were also passed for separating the palatine jurisdiction of Durham from the diocese for extinguishing the secular jurisdiction of the archbishop of York and the bishop of Ely in certain districts, and for imposing restrictions on the renewal of ecclesiastical leases. Finally, on the abandonment of the other church bills relative to residence and pluralities, and a new appropriation of the revenues of cathedral and collegiate churches, a bill was introduced for suspending for one year appointments to dignities in these establishments, and to sinecure rectories.

The Marriage Act was partly a measure of church reform. It puts an end to what has long been, of all the grievances of the dissenters, the one of which they have the most loudly complained. Instead of all persons, of whatever persuasion, being forced, as heretofore, in order to be legally married, to comply with the ritual of the established church, every person may now be married with whatever ceremonies he prefers, or if he pleases, without any religious ceremony at all, or any other form except that of making a declaration of the act before a public officer. Marriages may be simply a civil contract or religious ceremony, or both, and there are now four distinct modes by which they may be legally solemnised—the first three by licence, banns, or certificate, according to the rites of the church of England. In the fourth mode, they may be contracted in any registered place of religious worship, or in the office of the superintendent registrar.

The act for the celebrating of marriages was accompanied by another for Registering Births, Deaths, and Marriages, which both removes another of the complaints of the dissenters, and establishes a greatly-improved machinery for a matter of high interest and social importance to the community. The complete registry thus provided will be of great value as a statistical document, and an authentic record of facts not only precious to science, but of much utility in the practical work of government and legislation. It is proposed that the object of this statute shall be partly effected through the agency of the guardians of unions appointed under the poor law amendment act, the registrars and superintendent registrars being nominated, and their districts determined by the several boards of guardians.

An inconsistency in judicial administration, which allowed counsel in civil actions, in misdemeanor, and in high treason, but not in felony, was removed, and all persons tried for felonies are allowed to make their defence by counsel. Even in cases of summary conviction, the accused may make their defence, and examine witnesses, by counsel or attorney. Another alteration in criminal justice repeals those parts of the existing law relating to persons convicted of the crime of murder, which directs that every such person shall be condemned to be executed on the day next but one after that on which the sentence is passed, and that he shall after judgment be fed with bread and water only; and enacts that, in future, "sentence of death may be pronounced after conviction for murder in the same manner, and the judge shall have the same power in all respects, as after convictions for other capital offences." This amendment of the law is declared in the preamble to be made "for the ends of justice, and especially more effectually to preserve from an irrevocable punishment any person who may hereafter be convicted upon erroneous or perjured evidence."

Of the purport of the other statutes of the session, the following is a brief enumeration:—

Aliens permitted to reside by a more registration of their passports.

Lighthouses of the United Kingdom placed under the exclusive control of the Trinity House.

Provisions of the London act for the sale of bread extended to the country.

Period of granting ecclesiastical leases limited.

Encouragement given to building societies on the principle of friendly societies.

Postage of newspapers regulated.

Duties on newspapers, on certain classes of paper, and on East India sugar, reduced.

Fees allowed to medical witnesses attending coroners' inquests.

Poor law commissioners may require all assessments for the relief of the poor to be made on the net annual value of the property assessed.

Number of copies of every new book to be presented to the universities reduced.

The number of public general acts passed in 1836 was 117; in 1835, 84; in 1834, 95, in 1833, 106. The total number of private bills which received the royal assent in 1836 was 193, exceeding by 33 the number in 1835.

The number of railway bills introduced in the past session was 55, of which 33 were passed. In 1835 the railway bills passed was 18; in 1834, 14; in 1833, 11. The total number of railway bills passed in the ten years ending in 1836 was 127.

22. The annual meeting of the British Association for the advancement of science commenced at Bristol. The marquis of Lansdowne, who was to have presided, was prevented by the illness and untimely death of his eldest son, the earl of Kerry. The chair was filled by the marquis of Northampton, and a great number of literary and scientific characters were present during the week's proceedings.

25. From an official return made up to this day, it appears that the number of English residing in France, exclusive of continental tourists who pass annually through it, is as follows:—Paris, Versailles, and St. Cloud, 22,500; Boulogne, 11,000; Calais, 6,000; other parts of France, 11,000.

31. REVOLUTION IN SPAIN.—During the past and present months Spain has been the scene of fresh tumults and insurrections. At Malaga, Cadiz, Seville, and Cordova, the Cadiz constitution of 1812 has been proclaimed and provincial juntas established, wholly independent of the queen's authority. On the 3rd a movement commenced in Madrid; but it was put down and the capital declared in a state of siege. But on the 12th the insurrection became more serious, and a regiment of provincial militia doing duty at St. Ildefonso demanded the constitution of 1812. They forced themselves into the apartments of the queen-regent in spite of the remonstrances of the French and English ambassadors, and obtained from her promise of the acceptance of the constitution. This produced a revolution in the metropolis. Is uritz, the prime minister, made his escape, reached Lisbon, and from thence proceeded to England. General Quesada, the military governor of Madrid, was not so fortunate, being taken by the populace about three miles from the capital and savagely put to death. Ultimately, the constitution was proclaimed by the queen-regent, subject to the revision of the cortes, and a new ministry of decided liberals formed, comprising the following individuals :—Calatrava, president of the council and minister of foreign affairs; Gil de la Cuadra, minister of marine; J. M. Lopez, minister of the interior; Rodil, minister of war; Landero, minister of justice; Mendirabal, minister of finance. Arguñales refused to take office, but promised to support the ministry. The new government commenced with vigour. A forced loan to the amount of 2,000,000*l.* was sought to be raised; a conscription of 50,000 men was called for, to send against the Carlists; the property of emigrant Carlists was confiscated, and the example of France and Portugal was proposed to be followed, by the extinction of the remaining moiety of tithe, leaving the clergy stipendiaries of the state or dependant on voluntary contributions. Early in the ensuing year (see Feb. 24) some modifications in the constitution of 1812 were proposed and adopted by the cortes.

Sept. 7. RESIGNATION OF FRENCH MINISTERS.—The revolutionary movement in Spain, introduced great confusion into the French cabinet, already embarrassed by the question of intervention or non-intervention. M. Thiers and his colleagues were urgently pressing for an effective co-operation against don Carlos, and the king was averse to the sending of a French army in his own name into Spain, when the news arrived at Paris of the re-establishment of the constitution of 1812, which threw everything into greater embarrassment than ever. The order of things and the form of government which France had recognised, and which she bound herself to support as a part of the Quadruple Alliance, no longer existed in Spain, where the queen-regent, with whom the treaty was made, was coerced, and a captive in the hands of an armed force. To reinstate the queen in the position she held when the alliance was formed, and to interfere with arms between the constitutionalists and liberals of different shades was never contemplated, and ministers easily obtained a public declaration from the king, that he would not interfere "against any part or section of the liberals in Spain." But when he was pressed to reinforce the French legion already serving as auxiliaries in Spain, and to adopt other and extensive measures against the Carlists, as the only mode of hindering the queen's government from being carried away by the torrent of revolution and anarchy, he gave a decided refusal, upon which M. Thiers and five of his colleagues resigned. The king's refusal excited considerable discussion in France and England as to his motives and intentions. Nearly a fortnight elapsed before the difficulties could be overcome in the appointment of a new ministry. On the 7th the formation of a doctrinaire cabinet was announced in the Moniteur as follows :—M. Molé, president of the council and minister for foreign affairs; M. de Gasparin, minister of the interior; M. Guizot, minister of public instruction; M. Duchatel, minister of finance; M. Persil, minister of justice; vice-admiral Rosamel, minister of marine. The ministry of M. Thiers had lasted about nine months.

9. REVOLUTION AT LISBON.—A revolution in Spain is usually a prelude to a revolution in Portugal. But serious disagreements had arisen between the court and the cortes in August, owing to the appointment of prince Ferdinand, the husband of the queen, to the chief command of the army. This appointment had been incautiously made one of the marriage articles, and the prince was unwise enough to demand its fulfilment, notwithstanding its obvious unpopularity with the people and the military. The cortes were about voting an address against the army being under the command of a foreigner, when they were abruptly dissolved after sitting a week and before the supplies had been voted. The elections were unfavourable to the government; and popular discontents were aggravated by the high price of provisions, and the alleged encouragement given to foreign manufactures. At the height of these discontents happened the revolution at Madrid. On the 4th a conference of ministers was held at the residence of the duke of Terceira, at Belem, to take into consideration the critical circumstances in which the country was placed by the changes in Spain. It was determined to defer the opening of the cortes, which had been fixed for the 11th, and to make some important changes in the military commands, substituting officers contented with the present order of things for such as were known to desire the democratic constitution of 1812, which was established that year, in imitation of Spain, by a military revolt at Oporto. These measures, however, with several others adopted by ministers, proved to be altogether inefficient, and at their very first demonstration the liberals carried everything before them. The arrival of a steam-boat from Oporto, loaded with opposition deputies to the cortes from the northern provinces, appears to have been the signal for the movement. The steamer was welcomed by a prodigious discharge of rockets and pateraros, in defiance of the prohibition of such displays by the government. On the 9th, about an hour after sun-set, the clubs had arranged the proceedings, and a motley band of troops of the line, caca-dores, and national guards, proclaimed the constitution adopted by John VI. They then sang the constitutional hymn and appointed a deputation, headed by viscount Sa da Bandeira, to wait upon the queen. Donna Maria at first contemplated resistance, and ordered some of the regular troops to march against the insurgents, but the non-commissioned officers, exercising, as in Spain, the chief authority of their generals, refused to act, and also called for a change of government. Under such circumstances, the queen had no resource, save acquiescence. At five o'clock on the morning of the 10th, the national guards and their confederates, who had kept possession of the Rocio-square all night, were informed that her majesty had complied with all their wishes, and appointed the following ministry:—viscount Sa da Bandeira, minister of finance; count de Lumiares, president of council and minister of war; Vasconcellos, marine; Silva Posson, interior; Veira de Castro, justice and ecclesiastical affairs. The duke of Terceira, the ex-minister Carvalho and other individuals, who were apprehensive of popular vengeance, took refuge on board the British squadron lying in the Tagus. On the 18th, the peers addressed a formal protest to the queen against the revolution. It had the signatures of 27 out of 41; the total number of Portuguese peers. The duke of Palmella, the first in influence as ability, headed the protest. But the provinces expressed, by deputations, their approval of the proceedings in the capital.

15. NEWSPAPER PRESS.—This day, the reduction of the newspaper stamp-duty came into operation, when the price of the principal London daily newspapers was reduced from 7d. to 5d., which last is also the price of several of the weekly papers, though some have undergone an enlargement, and in price are only reduced 1d. Several newspapers are charged four-pence and four-pence halfpenny. The latter is the general price of the provincial papers, though a few are published at four-pence, and some, including the Liverpool papers, are charged five-pence. At Liverpool, a paper has been started, which is published three times a-week, and the Manchester Guardian which was previously published only once a-week, is now issued twice a-week. There was not a single provincial paper in England issued oftener than once a-week previous to the reduction of the stamp-duty. The old duty was 4d. with a discount of 20 per cent, which being 4-5ths of a penny on each sheet, made the net duty only 3d. and 1-5th of a penny. The new duty, on which there is no discount is 1d., and the actual reduction, therefore, is 2d. and 1-5th of a penny. The regular charge of a London paper is now estimated at 3d., namely, a stamp-duty of 1d.; an allowance to the news-vender of 1d. and 1-9th of a penny; and the cost of the paper which, for a sheet similar to the one on which The Morning Chronicle is printed, costs about 8-9ths of a penny. Total 3d.; leaving 2d. (exclusive of the profits from advertisements) to defray the expenses of printing, editorial and literary aid, reporters, foreign correspondents and a number of other charges.

20. Government advanced the interest on exchequer-bills to 2d. per cent. per day.

22. Session of the provincial parliament of Lower Canada opened by the earl of Gosford, governor-in-chief. It was shortly afterwards dissolved in consequence of the spirited opposition manifested by the members. The grievances and disputes were of the same kind as those which have been noticed in the upper province (May 28). The House of Assembly demanded an elective legislative council; and that they should have a control over the crown property as well as the taxes. By way of enforcing their demands, they had refused to vote a civil list; and all the public servants, even the judges, had remained unpaid till the executive applied the funds at its disposal to the payment of official salaries.

25. FOREIGN REFUGEES IN SWITZERLAND.—This generally peaceful country is seriously embroiled with the government of the French king. The Swiss as a free and republican people, have naturally sympathised in the unsuccessful efforts that have been made for liberty by several nations on the continent, especially since 1830, when France, that now seems inclined to persecute the authors of all such attempts, set an example to them all, and was the main cause of hurrying many men into rash plots and ill-calculated insurrections. When these men were scattered and driven from their homes by the hand of power, they took refuge in considerable numbers in Switzerland, which became the general asylum of Savoyard, Italian, German and Polish refugees. With very few exceptions, these men were entirely destitute; such of them as possessed any mechanical art readily found employment, but the support of the vast majority fell heavily on the cantons, where they fixed their abode. The Swiss mostly behaved with honourable liberality to these emigrants, especially the democratic party, who for some short time had been gaining ground in several of the cantons. When a series of little revolutions, which began in 1831, ensued, and the Swiss of the same canton fought against each other as Aristocrats and Liberals, many of the Polish and Italian refugees joined the people, and, as military men, directed their movements in the field;

but it is likely that, but for the impulse of the Paris revolution, which gave Louis Philip a throne, these insurrections would not have happened; while there are proofs that French emissaries encouraged the animosity against the aristocratic party, who were suspected of inclining to the Holy Alliance. These divisions and contests in the cantons continued up to the present year, while the mass of exiles from Italy, Poland, and Germany, already disturbing and burdensome enough to the honest Swiss, had been augmented by fresh arrivals from France of disappointed republicans and St. Simonians. It was hardly possible that such a gathering of the malcontents of all nations should continue long congregated without attempting some revolutionary enterprise. In 1834, a correspondence had been opened with secret societies in Savoy and Piedmont, and in the spring of that year a corps of refugees assembled suddenly on the northern side of the lake of Geneva, and, crossing that water, invaded Savoy, with arms in their hands, thus exposing the country that had granted them hospitality to the chances of a severe reprisal. Their wild expeditions as already noticed in the events of that year, was driven back with loss and shame to the very gates of Geneva, where they attempted to provoke a rising of the people against the government in that city. Notwithstanding this seditious outrage, the Swiss did not withdraw their protection, though some of the Cantons very properly took measures to prevent the recurrence of such outbreaks, and kept the refugees from the frontiers of States with which the Swiss were living at peace. All these States had taken the alarm long before; but soon after this adventure they began to make strong military demonstrations and to threaten Switzerland with a blockade. In March, 1835, nearly the whole of the line which Switzerland presents to the Rhine was watched by the troops of Baden, Wurtemberg and Bavaria; strong cantonnments of Piedmontese troops guarded the issues from the Valais, the Pays de Vaud, and Geneva, while the Austrians kept a jealous eye on the Italian Swiss Canton of Tesino, on the Grisons, on the country in the rear of St. Gall, and all other points where Switzerland touches their possessions in Italy. Before this precautionary cordon was formed, the majority of the Swiss Cantons voted what they considered a security to their neighbours for the future. They decreed that all foreigners settled in Switzerland, detected in establishing political associations, should be expelled; that all such as had participated in the disturbance of tranquillity in the neighbouring States should be delivered over to the Swiss courts, and tried and sentenced. But this did not satisfy their neighbours, who would have had every refugee delivered up to them, or, at least driven out of Switzerland. In the latter case, as the only country through which they could withdraw was France, and as Louis Philip would allow them no resting-place there, all these exiles must have flocked to England, whither the king of the French had already sent some of them in a starving condition, escorted by his gendarmes to the straits of Dover. The Swiss replied to this high and threatening language in terms of national pride and defiance. Louis Philip, who by this time was as apprehensive of the refugees and conspiracies as any of his neighbours, joined the general cry, at first moderately and in a tone of advice and remonstrance. For this, it is only just to admit that he had some cause; since it is known, that a connexion existed, by means of secret societies, between the malcontents of his own dominion and the Polish and other foreign exiles in Switzerland, who were not strangers to the concerted insurrections which deluged Paris and Lyons with blood, and after their defeat some of the French conspirators found protection across the Swiss frontier. It was to sever these affiliations that the late prime minister, M. Thiers, threatened Switzerland with an "hermetic blockade," which roused the ire of the democratic cantons; but the general diet of the cantons gave assurances that they would adopt such precautions as were consistent with national independence, for preventing future machinations against the French ruler by the exiles they sheltered; accompanying, however, this assurance with the stinging accusation, that some of the conspiracies complained of had been hatched by an agent of the French ambassador. This charge was founded on the confessions of the spy himself, who had been arrested, and found while going about Switzerland, with a passport signed by the duke of Montebello's chief secretary. The French court took fire at the imputation; their ambassador on the 26th delivered to the federal Diet an official note, intimating that all relations, diplomatic and commercial, were suspended, until satisfaction was made to France for the alleged affront. The British government offered its mediation through its ambassador. On the 17th October following there was an extraordinary meeting of the Diet, and after a lengthened sitting conciliatory measures were adopted. These were readily listened to by France, as the manufacturers of Lyons and the French wine-growers had already begun to feel the effects of an interruption of commercial intercourse with Geneva, St. Gall, and Zurich.

Oct. 1. A vigorous assault is made on the lines of general Evans at St. Sebastian by the Carlists, who made an unsuccessful attempt to carry them. Both parties fought bravely. The Carlists charging down-hill, frequently sallied from their works in force, but each time were driven back at the point of the bayonet. The Westminster Grenadiers distinguished themselves, and a small corps of Lancers, under colonel Wakefield, made several brilliant charges; but a much more effective arm was the well-appointed artillery under the direction of colonel Colquhoun. Balls, grape-shot, shells, Congreve rockets, and grapnells, were thrown with a precision that confounded the Carlists, and struck their recruits with panic. The conflict lasted twelve hours, and was not quite over till after dark. General Evans lost 376 men and 37 officers killed and wounded, and was slightly wounded himself. The loss of the Carlists was estimated at 1000 killed and wounded.

8. Louis Philip issued an ordinance remitting the sentences against political offenders, sixty-two in number. (See 493.) In most instances, however, this is rather a diminution of punishment than a free pardon.

17. Dutch states-general opened. In his speech from the throne the king regretted that, though he had devoted his exertions to bring about a final settlement of the Belgian question, no arrangement on that subject had yet been come to. The tone of the speech, however, was pacific. On the 20th the minister of finance brought forward the budget in the second chamber. He congratulated the house that, notwithstanding the "many cares and difficulties which were the inevitable consequences of the undesired Belgian insurrection," the country in its domestic circumstances was still continually advancing in prosperity and moral strength. Some reductions of taxation were announced, and the expenditure for 1837 was fixed at 44,617,013 florins.

19. A commission gazetted, by which Thomas Drummond, under secretary of state in Ireland, colonel John Fox Burgoyne, Peter Barlow, professor of mathematics at the military academy, Woolwich, and Richard Griffith, esq., are appointed his majesty's commissioners for considering and reporting upon a general system of railways in Ireland. Another commission gazetted, appointing C. S. Lefevre, lieutenant-colonel Rowan, and Edwin Chadwick, commissioners for inquiring and reporting upon the best means of establishing a constabulary or rural police for England and Wales.

A meeting held in London, Charles Lushington, M.P., in the chair, for the purpose of forming a church-rate abolition society. The meeting was attended by Mr. Hume, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Ewart, Mr. D. W. Harvey, and other members of parliament. The object of the society is to effect the entire abolition of church-rates, without any charge upon the consolidated fund or land-tax; and to introduce the principle of upholding the edifices of the church and the expenses of worship either by pew-rents or voluntary contributions.

20. Norwegian storting opened. The king described the finances of the country as in a flourishing state, the surplus of revenue being considerable, notwithstanding the reduction of one half of the land-tax. In a general exposition of the condition of the kingdom, which was, at the same time, submitted to the house, a hope is expressed, that, although the negotiations which had long been carrying on with the English government, to prevail upon it to change its policy in regard to the timber-trade, had hitherto been fruitless, the local interests by which such a change had been opposed would soon be obliged to give way. The population of Norway seems to have increased since 1815 from 900,000 to 1,200,000.

A numerous meeting at the Mansion House, at which it was resolved to erect by subscription a statue to the duke of Wellington, in the vicinity of London bridge, in testimony of the gratitude of the citizens for the zeal manifested by his grace in the erection of that structure, and in the adjoining local improvements in the city and Southwark.

29. A foolish attempt at insurrection at Strasburgh, by Louis Napoleon Buonaparte, nephew of the deceased emperor, aided by two officers and some privates, hired to cry "Vive l'empereur!" It was instantly suppressed, and the young prince shipped off to America by the French government. On the following day an attempt, almost as absurd, was made by a party of hussars at Vendôme.

30. A vacancy in the Irish court of exchequer filled up by the appointment of the attorney-general, Michael O'Loghlin. He is the first catholic that has sat on the bench since the revolution of 1688.

A great number of meetings have been held during this month, chiefly for the purpose of constituencies giving a public reception to their representatives. This species of political audit seems to have grown almost into an annual usage since the reform act. A deputation waited on lord Brougham, to invite him to dine with the citizens of Edinburgh. This invitation he declined. His lordship had been absent during the late parliamentary session owing to indisposition. In reply to the deputation, he said, "My health, which has been broken by the labours of the session in 1835, when the legislative proceedings of the year were crowded into six weeks, has now been restored. But I have resolved to avoid all risk of a relapse."

Nov. 1. The municipal elections seem to have gone nearly in the same direction as last year, namely, in favour of the liberal party. In some places, as, for instance, in Bristol, where the conservatives last year had a majority, they have been beaten in the late election. On the other hand, even in many of the larger towns, the conservatives have this year approached nearer to an equality with their opponents; and, in a considerable number of the smaller boroughs, they have returned a majority of the new councillors. On the whole, the returns, as was to be expected and desired, present some appearance of the domination of mere party gradually giving way to other influences better fitted to secure the benefits of good municipal government. The accounts of the annual parliamentary registration are conflicting, but in this, too, the general result appears to be in favour of the ministerial party.

3. Queen of Portugal, in concert with the foreign ambassadors, and the late ministers, Palmella, Saldanha, and Carvalho, attempted to effect a counter-revolution. They mistakingly thought it was sufficient to announce a desire of change, to call forth a general demonstration in their favour. Nobody came to Belem to their assistance; the national guard, the populace, the regular troops, and the royal guard, all turned out in defence of the order of things which it had been attempted to overturn. Thus unsupported, Donna Maria confessed her error, and was pardoned, and Sa da Bandeira and his colleagues re-instated.

4. DEATH OF CHARLES X.—The late king of France expired at Gortz in Illyria, in the 80th year of his age. He was the fifth son of dauphin Louis, son of Louis XV. The title of comte d'Artois was given him in infancy, which he retained during his wanderings in Europe, and until the accession of his brother, Louis XVIII. The story of the princes is the story of our Charles II. and his brother James II. over again. In both cases we have the same catastrophe—the expulsion from the throne of the reigning family; but still a compromise with the hereditary principle, in the substitution of the nearest collateral branch which circumstances would allow to be selected. The duke of Orleans has been the French prince of Orange. Even in the character of the Bourbons and Stuarts there is a singular coincidence. Charles II. and Louis XVIII. licentious wits; James II. and Charles X. licentious too, but honest bigots, and no wits. The parallel might have commenced earlier—between Charles I. and Louis XVI.—both beheaded, and their fate provoked by a similar train of incidents. The convocation of the legislatures forced upon the crowns by their pecuniary necessities, after government by royal prerogative had become to all appearance the settled constitution of the kingdoms—the immediate assumption of supremacy by the popular representatives—the long parliament in England—the national assembly in France—the extinction of the aristocracy—abolition of the church—trial and execution of the kings—establishment of republics—subjugation of the state to the power of the sword—away of great military chiefs—and after all, the restoration, for a brief period, of the old order of things, and the old line of monarchs, completed the cycle of corresponding vicissitudes through which both countries respectively passed in the seventeenth and the nineteenth centuries. The late Charles X. was extravagant, as well as dissipated and fanatical. During his first residence in England the British government fixed upon Holyrood-house, which is a privileged place, for his abode, that he might be safe from his creditors. He had, like his predecessors, many mistresses. The gloomy moroseness that marked some parts of his conduct is supposed to have been occasioned by a vow made to one of them. Madame de Polastron, on her death-bed, that he would never, after her decease have another mistress. He was only 45 years of age when he was so enchained, and he is said to have kept his engagement. After his expulsion from France in 1830, he was received in England, and allowed to pass without payment of customs; but, unable or unwilling to pay an old debt demanded, he again took sanctuary in Holyrood-house, whence he removed to the dominions of Austria. His death brings Louis Philip, in the estimation of some of his brother sovereigns, a little nearer to the rank of a legitimate monarch. Supposing the renunciation of the throne by the duke of Angoulême to be valid, there is only the young duke of Bourdeaux to withhold the allegiance of the royalists from the Orleans dynasty. It is, however, still a problem for the future to solve, whether the French king will be as successful in perpetuating his settlement as our William III. The throne of William of Nassau was not like that of Louis Philip—a throne of the barricades. It was not by republican pledges reached over the heads of a generous and confiding people. Moreover, the Orange sceptre had the support of a powerful aristocracy, which was then the nation, and had not to conciliate a public opinion, which did not exist, but is now omnipotent, intelligent, and ever watchful to prevent the consolidation of injustice.

7. BALLOON EXCURSION.—An aerial excursion from Vauxhall Gardens across the Channel excited great interest. The balloon was of unusually large dimensions. In the car was upwards of a ton of ballast, exclusive of brandy, wine, and other refreshments. Passports had also been provided for the continent. At 26 minutes past one in the afternoon the balloon rose, having in the car Mr. Green, Mr. Monk Masou, and Mr. Holland. At a quarter after 4 the sea was seen; 12 minutes before 5 they left England one mile east of Dover Castle; and 10 minutes before 6 they were over France two miles east of Calais. The aeronauts continued their course during the night, observing the starry firmament above, and the lights from the various towns they passed over below. At 5 o'clock there was a slight appearance of day-break; ten minutes after five they were at their highest altitude, the barometer being at 20 inches. At a quarter after 6 daybreak was indescribably magnificent. The balloon landed in perfect safety at a village called Weilburgh, in Nassau, at half-past 6 o'clock on Tuesday morning, after a prosperous voyage of 17 hours, having traversed a space equal to about 480 English miles.

8. Session of the Belgian chambers opened. In his speech king Leopold congratulated the members in warm terms on the general prospects of the country. Among other important reforms which had been effected or were in progress, particular mention was made of the re-organization of the state universities, and the project of law on the primary and intermediate schools. The government, it was added, in conformity with the intentions which the chambers had more than once manifested, had directed its particular attention to the fine arts. The revenue was spoken of as in a highly satisfactory condition. In reference to Holland, "I have well-founded hopes," said his majesty, "that peace will not be interrupted; yet prudence makes it our duty to remember that the army of a neighbouring state is maintained on our frontier in a menacing attitude."

15. The agricultural and commercial bank of Ireland stopped payment. For several days previously there had been a general run on many of the Irish banks.

The number of registered partners in the agricultural bank exceeded 5800, but the amount of paid-up capital did not amount to 400,000*l.*, while the number of its notes out after the stoppage amounted to 800,000*l.*

16. Sir Robert Peel elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow by a majority of 95. The numbers were, for sir Robert Peel, 316; for sir John Campbell, 221.

18. The Carlisle bank of Foster and Co. stopped payment.

The Gazette contained forty-six pages of advertisements of intended applications to parliament for bills for railroads.

23. Prince Polignac, who was prime minister at the revolution of 1830, and who, along with MM. Peyronnet, Chantelauze, and Guernon de Ranville, had been condemned to perpetual imprisonment, released and sent out of France. His colleagues had been previously set free.

24. The average price of wheat, which, at the commencement of the year was 36*s.* per quarter, appears by the official returns to be 60*s.* 4*d.* per quarter. The prices of provisions, and of coal and other articles, have been raised.

Dec. 5. The twenty-fourth congress of the United States opened. The questions of banking and the currency occupied a large portion of the message. President Jackson alluded to his speedy retirement from office.

21. Mr. O'Connell has met with a formidable opponent in the National Association, in the Rev. Mr. O'Mally, a catholic curate of Dublin, who repudiates the "instalment" system of the agitator in the redress of Irish grievances. Mr. O'Mally objects to the ministerial plan of converting tithe into a rent-charge, and, as the price of that conversion, giving thirty per cent. of the tithe to the landlords. Considering the poor the next claimants to the clergy themselves, he proposes that the whole tithe shall be converted into a provision for their relief, and the protestant clergy supported by the state. His resolutions to this effect were supported with ability, and only got rid of on the 21st by Mr. O'Connell moving that they be referred to a committee of the association.

Gomez, the enterprising partisan general of the Carlists, after traversing Spain in various directions with surprising rapidity, and reaching on the 21st ult. the Spanish lines near Gibraltar, has succeeded in eluding all his pursuers, and on the 21st had regained the fastnesses of Navarre, where he again sets at defiance the queen's troops.

24. Died at Narbonne, aged 55, general Mira, a distinguished Spanish constitutional commander, who first commenced his military career in Navarre against the French in 1810. The partisan laurels he won over Napoleon's troops had been tarnished by his late sanguinary proceedings against the Carlists, especially ordering the mother of Cabrera to be shot (p. 995). His health had long been bad, which, with the protraction of the civil war, may have helped to inflame the revengeful ferocity common to the natives of the Peninsula.

Bilboa, which had been invested by the Carlists, under Villa Real, and the siege pressed with great vigour, was delivered by the defeat of the besiegers by Espartero, assisted by British naval co-operation. The Carlists had been aided in their attacks on the city by the Polish, Italian, and other refugees, belonging to the French legion, lately disbanded by Louis Philip. Espartero entered Bilboa next day in triumph.

27. French chambers opened. A shot was fired at the royal carriage on its way, the ball passing through the back of the vehicle and narrowly missing the king. Meunier, the person who fired, was apprehended, with one or two other persons. The king proceeded to the chambers, and delivered a speech of considerable length, in which he alluded to the attempt upon his life. Meunier was afterwards tried, and condemned to the guillotine, but his sentence was changed into banishment for ten years.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—J. Davidson, the enterprising African Traveller; he was murdered by the El Hareb tribe, in the district of Egeda, in Africa. Lieut-col. James Tod, 52, annalist of Rajpootana, and successful collector of Indo-Grecian antiquities. At Brussels, of pulmonary apoplexy, Thomas Walker, 50, magistrate of Lambeth-street police-office, and author of a periodical called "The Original." Mr. Walker was a native of Manchester, and the son of an extensive manufacturer in that town, who was tried for high treason at Lancaster early in the French revolution. Richard Valpy, 82, head master of Reading grammar-school. At Knaresborough, Edward Day, 101, one of the constables who arrested Eugene Aram, who was executed at York in 1758. (See Aug. 3.) Captain Felix McDonough, author of the "Hermit in London." R. Seymour, who for five years supplied the clever caricatures in "Figaro in London." Mr. Seymour was subject to fits of despondency, in one of which he committed suicide. James Wood, 80, a banker and draper of Gloucester, as his father and grandfather had been. Mr. Wood was a bachelor, and, his habits being very penurious, he accumulated great wealth; the personal property of the deceased amounted to about 900,000*l.* the testamentary disposition of which became a subject of litigation, and has been recently annulled. James Horsburgh, 74, hydrographer to the East India Company. Barry O'Meara, author of a "Voice from St. Helena." Sir Francis Freeling, 73, secretary to the general post-office, a situation he had filled for nearly half a century. William Thomas, earl of Kerry, 25, M.P. for Calne, and eldest son of the marquiss of Lansdowne. Sir William Cusack Smith, 73, second baron of the Irish court of exchequer, and the author of an able volume entitled "Metaphysic Rambles." At Paris, Thomas Reynolds, formerly a mercer of Dublin, and the United Irishman who betrayed to the government the plans of that formidable society, and which led to the arrest in 1798 of the leaders, at the house of Mr. Bond, and the frustration of the rebellion. Hon. H. A. B. Craven, 60, a retired major-general, and uncle to the earl of Craven. The deceased had been a considerable loser at Epsom races, and he terminated his existence by shooting himself through the head. Charles Henry, M.D., 60, one of the greatest scientific ornaments of Manchester, and a chemist of the highest reputation. Dr. Henry was found in the private chapel attached to his house, quite dead, having shot himself with a pistol. Suddenly at Manchester, supposed from the fatigue of travelling and over-excitement, Madame Malibran de Beriot, 28, the celebrated vocal actress: this admirable performer had rapidly risen into great popularity, and was considered unrivalled in "action and in song." She was twice married; first, at New York, to an old merchant, who almost immediately after was declared insolvent; and, second, to De Beriot, the eminent violinist. Charles Day, the wealthy blacking manufacturer: his property, exclusive of an estate near Croydon, is said to amount to 450,000*l.* Near New York, colonel Aaron Burr, 80, notorious for his fatal duel with general Hamilton in 1804, which drove him from the United States, and his Mexican expedition, which involved him in a trial for high treason. John Bannister, 76, the famous comedian: he took leave of the stage in 1815, after thirty-seven years of almost unequalled popularity. At Moffatt, John Loudon M'Adam, 80, the introducer of the system of road-making known by his name. Hon. George Augustus Lamb, 29, only son of viscount Melbourne. Matthias Attwood, 94, father of Matthias Attwood, M.P. for Whitehaven, and of Thomas Attwood, M.P. for Birmingham. Neill Donegal, Mrs. Charles Gallagher, 109; at the age of 59 Mrs. Gallagher gave birth to three children, two of whom survived her. (Ann. Reg. lxxviii. 222.) John Richardson, 70, the itinerant dramatic showman: though his first recollection of himself was that of a little urchin in the workhouse of Great Marlow, he died worth 20,000*l.*, most of which he left to two nephews and a niece. The earl of Rosslyn, 75, a general in the army; his lordship, like his uncle, the first lord Loughborough, (p. 664,) was something of a whig, though he took office under the Wellington ministry; he voted in favour of the catholic claims, but was active in his opposition to the reform bill.

A.D. 1837, Jan.—SPECULATION AND OVERTRADING.—The state of general prosperity which was noticed at the beginning of the past year was followed in the summer by those symptoms of mercantile reaction that have been usually observed periodically to succeed periods of great industrial activity and commercial adventure. The present revulsion had a similar origin, and was marked by similar characteristics, as those previously assigned to 1825-6; but its effects were more limited in this country, and less enduring, than the ruinous pecuniary desolation which signalized the former period. The chief distinction between the elemental causes of the two was the more limited agency of private credit and the greater share banking and overtrading had in producing the crisis of 1836-7. In the existing difficulties banking and speculation, especially of the American houses and of the Americans themselves, seem to have been the chief, if not the exclusive, sources of embarrassment. The recent partiality for joint-stock banks in England and Ireland grew out of the disasters which befel the banking firms in 1825; their destruction in that and former periods of commercial difficulty was considered to have arisen from the narrow basis on which they had been established, and that, by increasing their capital and the number of persons interested in their stability, their strength would be augmented. It was with the view of carrying out these views that the government prevailed upon the bank of England to surrender some of their immunities. Joint-stock banks were no longer restricted to six, but were allowed, like the banks of Scotland, to have any number of partners with direct agencies in London. Either from the absence of enterprise, however, or the torpor that naturally followed the convulsion of 1825, these encouragements produced little immediate effect; and from that year to 1833 only thirty joint-stock banks had been established. But in 1833, the charter of the bank being renewed, divested of most of its exclusive privileges, either from this cause or more probably the revival of commercial enterprise, joint-stock banks rapidly multiplied. In 1833 there was an addition of ten; in 1834 of eleven; in 1835 of nine; and in the first ten months of 1836 there was the enormous increase of forty-five joint-stock banks. In Ireland, from 1834 to the end of 1836, ten joint-stock banks had been established, making an aggregate of eighty-two, exclusive of their branches, which are equivalent to so many banks, in all the chief towns of the two kingdoms. The connexion between these banking associations and the commercial difficulties of the present year formed a subject of controversy between Mr. Horsley Palmer, the leading advocate of the bank of England, and Messrs. Lloyd, Salomons, and Ricardo, who leaned to the side of the country banks. In considering their respective statements, there seems to have been little more than the old degree of particeps criminis that distinguished former periods of pecuniary pressure. The crisis of the present year was the counterpart, as before remarked, in its leading features, of that which ten years had preceded it: in both the coming storm was preluded by a wild spirit of mercantile venture; but the embarrassments created were neither so generally diffused in, nor exclusively limited to, England—they extended to Ireland and the United States, where a scene of monetary disorder presented itself wholly unexampled: bankers, importers, merchants, traders, and the government, being commingled in one mass of temporary insolvency. On both sides of the Atlantic difficulties, however, had a common origin—an inordinate thirst of gain; in America sought to be realized by land-jobs and overtrading in British produce; in England from excess of exports, railway projects, joint-stock companies for insurance, distilleries, cemeteries, newspapers, sperm-oil, cotton-grist, and zoological gardens. The mania for these share-undertakings was not limited to London, but was equally rife in Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds. The banks fed the flame, though they did not kindle it. The first light, as Mr. Tooke has shown, always comes from the temptation of low prices and a tendency to higher, which, generating increasing consumption and demand, rouse into action the mercantile classes. No sooner are these symptoms abroad than the banks let go their paper, and instantly the commercial world is in a blaze. With the example of greater confidence in the banks, of readiness to afford advances to individuals, the sphere of private credit by bills and open account is instantly distended to an enormous size. The scene is changed as if by magic. Mistrust, stagnation, and inertness, are converted into boundless confidence, mercantile activity, and speculative enterprise. Money, or what passes for money, is everywhere abundant; a community of sellers becomes one of buyers, and the wits of speculators and adventurers of every denomination set to work to absorb the seeming capital that overflows in every channel. That this was the cycle of the last as of former mercantile revolutions, is established by the state of prices and the issues of the banks. From 1834 to the summer of 1836 prices were on the advance, and speculation active. During the same period the provincial banks, both of England and Ireland, augmented their issues; and, though the bank of England did not contemporaneously increase its circulation of notes, it was enabled to aid individual enterprise by the vast amount of private deposits at its disposal, and of which of late years it has become the great reservoir. It is private balances, not an increase of its issues, that has, since 1826, constituted the active trading resources of the bank. In the use of their circulating capital, the directors have been accused of either undue eagerness to profit by its employment, or indiscreet precipitancy in their banking operations; of having afforded too much accommodation to individuals from August, 1835, to April, 1836, in order to facilitate the working of the West India loan of 1835; and then, when their own turn in that speculation had been served, of suddenly narrowing their discounts either to stop the efflux of gold to Ireland and the United States, or to enable them better to support the northern and central bank to which they were committed, and the American houses. In the interval mentioned, advances could be readily obtained on stock and other approved securities, but, as the summer advanced, discounts were abruptly refused to the largest and hitherto most respectable houses of Liverpool and London: trade in consequence became paralysed; prices suddenly dropped from 30 to 40 per cent., and the various share bubbles floated on the tide of the previous pecuniary redundancy rapidly collapsed from want of dupes or instalments. This is one view that has been taken of the monetary pressure. But it is just to observe that there is always a period in the movements of commerce when it is incumbent on the banks to interfere for their own safety and that of the community; and that this point is, when commerce has obviously degenerated into unprincipled adventures, not founded on the regular demands of trade either present or future, but solely on the command of unstinted resources. It is often only by withholding the means that the speculative furor can be arrested; that traffic can be prevented degenerating into mere gambling and monopoly, by which all pecuniary bargains and contracts are deranged and prices forced up to an extravagant height, destructive of internal consumption and foreign commerce. At the same time, the exercise of this wholesome check is sure to be inconvenient to some, and will assuredly incur the censure of those parties whose miscalculations or mercantile avidity have tempted them into undertakings beyond their available resources. In the production of present difficulties PRIVATE CREDIT participated conjointly with the issues and advances of the banks, both in town and the country. These quicken into life, but, after that is done, private credit, by the multiplication of bills of exchange and the extension of current accounts, forms the great machinery of commercial operations. Of the expansive power of these agents and the mighty fulcrum they afford for speculation, the disclosures made by the great American houses of London—"the three W's" as they were termed—are a demonstration. The following account of these firms, published in June, 1837, presents features in the history of commerce deserving to be recorded. They are the amount of bills payable from June to December:—

Wilson and Co.	£936,300
Wiggin and Co.	674,700
Wildes and Co.	505,000
Total of acceptances	£2,116,000

An aggregate of acceptances to the amount of 2,116,000*l.* is upwards of one-sixth part of the aggregate circulation of the private and joint-stock banks of England and Wales, and about one-eighth part of the average circulation of the bank of England. Bills of exchange are not cash, but, when accepted by houses of undoubted credit, possess almost equal active force in the commercial world. The following are the amount of their shipments to America, which attest a not less speculative avidity in the United States than had prevailed in England:—

Wiggin and Co.	£1,118,900
Wildes and Co.	623,000
Wilson and Co. (dry goods account)	364,900

If this is not overtrading, it is certainly audacious enterprise. It shows that there is in British and American merchants, as will as in the seamen of the two countries, a spirit of hardy adventure that can be matched in no other nations. The above instances have been chronicled as examples of the commercial spirit of the age and of the magnitude of individual transactions, aided by the resources of private credit. In conclusion, it is satisfactory to mention that, within two years after, almost the entire of the pecuniary difficulties of 1836-7 had passed away, commerce had resumed its wonted channels and activity, and that the great houses mentioned above were in a condition to meet all demands against them, chiefly in consequence of the banks of the United States, the whole of which had stopped payment, having again resumed payments in specie and the regular transaction of banking business with their customers.

11. Sir Robert Peel delivered an inaugural address on his installation as lord rector of the university of Glasgow, and on the 13th he was entertained at a grand banquet given by the conservatives, at which nearly 3500 citizens were present.

23. Banquet in Drury-lane theatre to Messrs. Byng and Hume, the members for Middlesex. The pit was boarded over, and it was the first instance of a political dinner given in one of the large theatres. A host 1500 persons were present, exclusive of a splendid galaxy of ladies, who occupied the boxes, and spectators in the galleries. Lord William Russell presided. In the course of his address to the electors, on his health being drunk, Mr. Byng remarked that he had represented them and their fathers for fifty years. He said that he was against the French war in 1793, both from "principle and policy; but that *nineteenth*s of the country were in favour of it." This is important, as the testimony of a whig, and confirms what has been previously advanced on the popular auspices (p. 571) under which that great contest began.

31. PARLIAMENT opened by commission; the lord-chancellor read the king's speech. It announced the continuance of friendly relations with foreign powers; alluded to the successful naval co-operation afforded to Spain, to the late change in Portugal, and to the state of Lower Canada, to which last the attention of parliament was directed. A renewal of the inquiry into the operation of joint-stock banks was recommended; as, also, measures for the improvement of civil and criminal justice, and for giving increased stability to the established church; by promoting concord and good-will. Special attention was directed to the state of Ireland, involving a consideration of municipal corporations, the collection of tithes, and a legal provision for the poor, which last was described as "a difficult, but pressing question." Addresses were agreed to in both houses almost without discussion. The duke of Wellington said he had seldom heard a speech less liable to objection. In the commons the chief novelty was a speech of Mr. Roebuck, accusing Mr. O'Connell of selfishness, and the whigs of pandering to the popular passions on one side, and to patrician feelings on the other. Before reading a copy of the speech, the speaker read two letters, one from the lord-chancellor, intimating that he had issued his warrant for the apprehension of a member of the house, Mr. Charlton, for a contempt of court, and another from Mr. Charlton, claiming his parliamentary privilege. A committee was appointed to inquire, which reported that there had been no interference with the privileges of the house, and Mr. Charlton was afterwards liberated from the Fleet, on expressing, by petition to the lord chancellor, contrition for his offence, which was an improper interference in a suit in chancery.

Liberals	100
Whigs	152
• Total ministerialists	332
Conservatives	80
Tories	139
Ultra-tories	100
	319

The speaker and six vacant seats made up the remaining seven votes.

Feb. 2. A numerous meeting at the Crown and Anchor, to petition parliament for the total abolition of church-rates. Next day 400 delegates from dissenting congregations and anti-church-rate associations from all parts of England walked in procession from the tavern to Downing-street, to have an interview with viscount Melbourne.

The parochial authorities of the city of London met and passed resolutions deprecating the introduction of the new poor law into the city.

6. Petition from Messrs. Hansard, printers of the house of commons, presented, complaining that an action for libel had been brought against them, in consequence of a passage in a printed report of a committee of the house on the state of prisons, in which it was stated that disgusting books had been found in Newgate, printed by a bookseller, whose name was mentioned. It gave rise to a long conversation on parliamentary privileges. Next day the action Stockdale v. Hansard was tried in the court of king's bench. Lord Denman said that he was not aware the authority of the commons could justify the publication of a libel; an opinion which led to the institution of an inquiry into the extent of the privileges of the commons, in the printing and publishing their reports, votes, and proceedings; and, May 30, lord Howick moved resolutions to the following effect:—That, the power of publishing the proceedings of the house is essential to its functions; that it is the sole judge of the extent of its own privileges; and that, therefore, it was a breach of privilege to bring any action upon them before any court or tribunal; and that it was a contempt of parliament for any such court or tribunal to assume to decide such matter of privilege. These resolutions were passed by 126 to 26. Lord Denman gave notice of a motion respecting the resolutions, in the upper house, which he afterwards withdrew, the action in the court of law was suffered to proceed, and the judges have not yet given judgment. As the parliamentary papers are now openly sold, with the permission of the house of commons, and to the great convenience of many persons, this wider diffusion of their contents will probably render the commons more careful in future in giving circulation to any statements that may be detrimental to the character or interests of individuals.

7. Died at St. Gall, in Switzerland, in his 58th year, GUSTAVUS II., who, since his deposition from the throne of Sweden, had privately visited England and other countries under the name of colonel Gustavson. The ex-king had much of the wilfulness of his predecessor, Charles XII., and his ill-timed resistance to the power of Napoleon and strange treatment of sir John Moore showed that he was unfit to reign. The latter years of his life had been spent in great poverty, pertinaciously refusing any pecuniary aid, beyond his annuity of 96*l*. He had several children, one, a son, educated in the university of Edinburgh, and now a general in the Austrian service. He was succeeded on the Swedish throne by his uncle, the duke of Sudermania, who was succeeded by marshal Bernadotte, the reigning sovereign.

7. Lord John Russell introduced the bill for the amendment of the municipal corporations of Ireland. It differed little from the bill thrown out last session, the chief provisions of which have been described.

10. Lord de Roos, premier baron of England, is found guilty, by the verdict of a jury, of cheating at cards, after a trial which lasted during this and the whole of the preceding day.

13. Lord John Russell detailed in a committee of the whole house the government plan for introducing poor-laws into Ireland. He stated that the support of mendicants in that country fell almost solely on the humbler classes, and that the farmers and cottiers contributed in food from 700,000*l*. to 1,000,000*l*. annually. The chief feature of the ministerial bill is, that it contemplates a legal relief to all classes of the destitute, as well able-bodied as infirm: but there is to be no out-door relief; nor any relief except in workhouses. When the plan comes into full operation, it is calculated that Ireland will be divided into 100 unions, with a workhouse and board of guardians for each. The English poor-law commissioners, with the prospective addition of one to their number, are to introduce and control the scheme. It was favourably received by the house, though strenuously opposed by Mr. O'Connell on the second reading, as an inadequate measure. The progress of the bill was interrupted by the dissolution of parliament.

13. A trial, that commenced on the 10th, terminated, in which Dr. Morrison, the vender of a universal medicine-pill, obtained 200*l*. damages against the Weekly Dispatch, for a libel relating to a charge of insolvency; but the verdict was for the defendants on the issue relating to the dangerous nature of the pill.

14. Motion by sir William Molesworth, to repeal the statutes requiring a property qualification in members of parliament, rejected by 133 to 104.

16. Motion of Mr. C. Lushington, for the exclusion of bishops from parliament, lost by 197 to 92.

18. Six new steamers have been launched by the Austrian government, for the navigation of the Danube.

19. Champion, a mechanic, having been arrested on a charge of constructing a new infernal machine to destroy Louis Philip, hangs himself in prison.

20. Meeting at the Crown and Anchor, for commencing a subscription to erect monuments in London and Edinburgh to the memory of Muir, Palmer, Skirving, Gerald, and Margatot, who, forty-four years before, (see p. 584,) had suffered in the cause of parliamentary reform. Mr. Hume was in the chair. Colonel Thompson, Mr. D. W. Harvey, and fifteen other members of parliament, were present.

22. After three nights' debate, lord F. Egerton's motion for the abolition, instead of the amendment, of the Irish municipal corporations, rejected by 322 to 242.

23. Second reading of the Wills Bill moved by lord Langdale, who stated the changes which subsequently became law. Lords Brougham and Abinger expressed high approbation of the intended improvements. The new measure abolishes all wills by ~~parole~~, or otherwise than in writing, excepting the cases of soldiers or seamen. Wills of personal estate must now be attested by two or more witnesses, in the same manner as wills of real estate; and all descriptions of property, real, personal, freehold, or copyhold, are placed on the same footing in the mode of devising them.

24. Mr. Walter moves for a committee to inquire into the operation of the poor-law act. An amendment is proposed by lord John Russell, for a committee to inquire into the administration of the relief of the poor, under the orders and regulations of the poor-law commissioners. Debate adjourned, and resumed on the 27th, when the minister's amendment for a committee, having power for a full inquiry, short of calling in question the principle of the bill, was agreed to.

24. SPANISH CONSTITUTION.—This instrument, which was first proclaimed at Cadiz in 1812, again by Riego in 1820, was for the third time introduced, and draughted or presented to the general cortes, assembled for the purpose on the 24th, by a special committee appointed last year to revise its provisions. The following are some of the articles of the constitution, which the cortes has sanctioned and decreed to be that of the Spanish monarchy:—1. All Spaniards may print and publish freely their opinions, without submitting them to any previous censorship, by merely conforming to the laws: the trial of offences of the press belongs exclusively to a jury. 2. The same code of laws shall be enforced in the whole monarchy, and there shall be only one common law in ordinary civil and criminal prosecutions. 3. All Spaniards are admissible to all offices and public functions according to their merit and capacity. 4. Penalty of confiscation of property prohibited. 5. The nation engages to provide for the maintenance of religion, and the ministers of the Catholic faith professed by the Spanish nation. An amendment to this article was proposed, but failed, to the effect that "no Spaniard shall in future be prosecuted or tried for his religious opinions;" contrary to expectation, it was opposed by M. Arguelles. 6. The power of making laws resides in the cortes and the king. The cortes to consist of two legislative assemblies equal in rights and power—a senate and a congress of deputies. The number of senators to be equal to three-fifths of the deputies.

The senators to be chosen by the king out of a list of three candidates, presented by the electors of each province qualified to return deputies to the cortes. The number of senators chosen to be proportioned to the population of each province. They must be 40 years old, possessed of an independent fortune, and are chosen for life. To the congress of deputies, each province to return one deputy, at least, for every 50,000 souls of its population. To be entitled to sit as a deputy, it is necessary to be a layman, 25 years of age, and possessed of the other qualifications required by the electoral law. The deputies are elected for three years. Any deputy accepting a pension, office, or commission, salaried by the government, is subjected to re-election. 7. The cortes to meet every year, the king having the power to convolve, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve the congress; but, in the latter case, must assemble another cortes within three months. 8. The deputies to appoint their president, vice-president, and secretaries. 9. One of the legislative bodies not to meet without the other, unless it be to sit in judgment on the ministers. 10. The legislative bodies cannot deliberate in one assembly, nor in the presence of the king. 11. The sittings of both chambers to be public. 12. The person of the king sacred and inviolate, and not responsible. The ministers to be held responsible. The powers of the crown are analogous to those of the British sovereign: but he cannot, unless empowered by a special law, alienate or exchange any portion of the Spanish territory, nor admit foreign troops into the kingdom; nor ratify treaties of an aggressive nature or those of a special commercial nature, or which stipulate the affording of subsidies to foreign powers; nor can he contract marriage or permit it to be contracted by those in the line of the succession. 13. The civil list of the king and royal family to be fixed at the commencement of each reign. 14. The succession to the crown to be in the order of primogeniture, preferring, in the same degree, the older to the younger, and the male to the female branch. 15. If a queen regnant marries, her husband cannot take any part in the government of the kingdom. 16. The cortes may exclude from the succession persons they deem incapable to govern, or who have been guilty of any act for which they ought to lose their right to the crown. 17. Whatever the king may order to be done must be signed by the minister to whose department it appertains, and no public functionary shall execute any decree deficient in this authentication. 18. Ministers may be senators or deputies, and take part in the discussions of both chambers, but can only vote in that to which they belong. 19. Independence of the judges and judicial administration are secured. The remaining articles relate to the election of deputations for the provinces, and municipalities for the towns, the constitution of the military force, and taxation. In the revised constitution no alteration has been made in the qualifications of the deputies, nor of the elective constituency, which continues regulated by the electoral law. A bill passed during this session of the cortes, providing that the orphans of all those who died "martyrs to the cause of liberty" since 1823 shall be adopted by the nation, and that the names of Riego, Empecinado, Torrijos, Mina, and some others, shall be inscribed in the churches.

March 3. The chancellor of the exchequer explained the principle of his measure for the abolition of church-rates. The management of church lands to be vested in eleven commissioners, five clerical and six lay, of whom three are to be paid commissioners. The lands of the bishops, and of the deans and chapters, to be vested in the commissioners; and by a better system of management, by getting rid of the present system of letting on fines, suffering the leases to run out and re-letting the lands on better terms, it is calculated 250,000*l.* per annum may be saved. This sum, aided by pew-rents, it is supposed will be sufficient for the purposes to which church-rates are now applied. In certain cases, the church tenants will be allowed to purchase the fee-simple of their holdings, subject to a fixed rent payable to the commissioners. A resolution embodying the principle of the scheme was submitted to the house. It was opposed by sir R. Inglis, sir W. Follett, and others, on the ground that it was making the church support itself, and, indirectly, a recognition of the "voluntary principle" in religion, and, therefore, subversive of the national church. The debate was adjourned, and resumed on the 13th and 14th, when the resolution was carried by 273 to 250. At a subsequent stage, a motion for introducing a bill founded on the ministerial plan was only carried by 287 to 282; and lord John Russell shortly after intimated that the bill, for the present, was abandoned, with the view of appointing a committee to inquire into the mode of leasing and managing the real estates of the church.

4. Martin Van Buren installed president of the United States. He succeeded general Jackson.

6. AFFAIRS OF CANADA.—Lord John Russell submitted to parliament a series of resolutions respecting Lower Canada, rendered necessary by the discontented and agitated state of the province, and the refusal of the colonial legislature to vote the supplies of money requisite to the administration of justice and the carrying on the government. The resolutions stated in substance, that no supplies had been voted since Oct. 31, 1832; that the supplies up to the current year amounted to 142,160*l.*; that the house of assembly demanded an elective legislative council and the repeal of an act passed by the imperial parliament in favour of the North American land company; that in the present state of the province the granting of these demands is inexpedient; that it is advisable to repeal certain acts affecting trade and tenures, provided the colonial legislature would pass a law for the discharge of lands therein from feudal dues and services; that, for defraying the arrears due and the customary charges of the government, the governor be empowered to apply to these objects the hereditary, territorial, and casual revenues of the crown; that the crown revenues be placed under the control of the colonial legislature after supplies have been voted for defraying the charges of government; lastly, that the colonial legislatures of both the Canadas be empowered to remove the obstacles which impede the trade and commercial intercourse of the two provinces. Mr. Roebuck, and some other members, opposed the resolutions as an infringement of the Canadian constitution, and a coercing of the people. But, the violent proceedings of the colonial parliament calling for strong measures, they met with the general support of political parties. The debate was adjourned, and each resolution separately, and the entire series, agreed to, April 24.

7. Mr. Grote brought forward his annual motion for the adoption of the ballot in parliamentary elections, which was rejected by 265 to 153. In 1833 the motion was rejected by 211 to 106; in 1835 by 317 to 144; in 1836 by 139 to 51 votes.

8. Independence of the Texas country recognised by the United States of America. It drew forth a protest from the Mexican government.

9. The archbishop of Canterbury presents petitions against the ministerial plan for the abolition of church-rates, and expresses, on the part of 15 bishops, their decided opposition to the measure. A discussion takes place between the archbishop, the prime minister, and other lords; the petitions are ordered to lie on the table.

10. On the vote for the navy estimates, lord Mahon calls the attention of the house to the state of Spain, when lord Palmerston, in a long and able speech, defends the course of policy adopted by his majesty's government. Mr. O'Connell disclaims any alliance between don Carlos and catholicism, and inveighs against the conduct of the king of the French.

11. Meeting at the Mansion-house in the city, to set on foot a subscription for the relief of the tenantry of the landowners in the north of Scotland, alleged to be in great distress. The lord-mayor presided. A large sum of money was subscribed.

Several bankers at Tours are convicted of having tampered with the persons in charge of the telegraph at that place, with a view to obtain early and secret information for stock-jobbing purposes.

16. Mr. Clay's motion for admitting corn at a fixed duty lost in the commons by 223 to 89.

23. Prior to the Easter recess, lord John Russell obtained leave to introduce a series of bills, which were passed into statutes, for the amendment of the criminal law. Among the objects embraced by these measures were a further diminution of capital punishments, the limitation of transportation, and the judicial power of awarding solitary imprisonment. The extreme penalty of the law has now been removed from all offences except seven, namely, treason, murder, rape, sodomy, burglary, robbery with violence, and arson with intent to commit murder. Death punishment is abolished in all cases of forgery.

27. Above 30,000 persons go from London to Greenwich, by the railroad, to the Easter fair.

28. Died at Brighton, in her 80th year, Mrs. Fitzherbert, who first married, in 1775, Edward Weld, esq., of Lutworth Castle, uncle to the late cardinal Weld. Her second marriage was with Mr. Fitzherbert, who died in 1781. She had no children by either husband. Her beauty, fascinating manners, and domestic virtues, never attracted the attentions of the prince of Wales, to whom, as already mentioned, (p. 776) she was married. Her disposition was frank, generous, indulgent, and hospitable. It is supposed that an annuity of 8000*l.* a year reverts to the royal family by her death.

Apr. 5. Upwards of 8,000 looms unemployed in Spitalfields. Her majesty began a subscription for the distressed weavers by a donation of 100*l.*

7. Bishop of Exeter, on presenting petitions against the Poor Law Act, made a speech attacking that measure. It was defended by lords Brougham, Melbourne, and others. The duke of Wellington said,—"I avow at once that I supported the bill at the time his majesty's ministers proposed it; and I do not repent of what I did on that occasion in supporting it, but on the contrary, I rejoice, in the part I then took, and I now congratulate his majesty's ministers on its success."

11. The earl of Radnor's bill, for the revision of the statutes of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, thrown out without a division, on the second reading.

Trial of James Greenacre and Sarah Gale, which commenced the preceding day, at the central criminal court, for the murder of Hannah Brown, terminated. Greenacre was sentenced to be executed, and Gale, a woman with whom he cohabited, who was convicted, not of the murder, but of being accessory after the fact, to be transported for life. This case was productive of great excitement on the part of the public. From the singular atrocity of its circumstances. In the early part of the year, the head, trunk, and lower members of a female, having been found in three separate and distinct parts of the metropolis, great efforts were made, for some time without success, to discover the supposed murderer. The mutilated remains were at length identified as those of a female, whom Greenacre, tempted by some trifling savings she had accumulated as a laundress, had promised to marry; and on his apprehension, he confessed that he had killed her, by what he termed an accidental blow, given in passion, and had disposed of the body in fragments to conceal the murder. This happened at Walworth, in a small cottage of which Greenacre was the owner, and to which he had invited Mrs. Brown. On the night he was taken he tried to strangle himself, and was found in his cell by the gaoler, in a state of insensibility. He expressed regret that his life had been saved, and that he had not been permitted, as he said, "to go off." A more artful and cold-blooded villain never suffered at the Old Bailey. He met death with unshrinking nerve, and neither during his trial, nor at the place of execution, did a single expression escape him, of pity for his victim, or remorse for his crime.

12. Mr. Hume's bill, to vest the assessment and control of the county rates, in a board of 12 or 20, elected by the ratepayers, instead of the county magistrates, as at present, was rejected on the second reading in the commons, by 177 to 84. The county rates had increased, partly from lavish expenditure, and many members expressed themselves in favour of the principle of the bill, but opposed to its details.

13. Mr. Roebuck's motion, the object of which was to repeal the penny stamp on newspapers, rejected by 81 to 42. It was opposed by the chancellor of the exchequer, who, repudiated the idea that government wished by the continuance of the tax to retain a control over the public press. The reduction of the duty to a penny (the amount levied in queen Anne's reign) had been completely successful, by greatly increasing the circulation of newspapers, and entirely crushing the illicit traffic in unstamped journals.

In this month died lady de Lisle, the eldest, and favourite daughter of the king, by Mrs. Jordan; also, the duchess dowager of Saxe-Meiningen, mother of the queen.

May 1. Lord Morpeth brought forward a resolution for the settlement of the Irish tithe question. He reminded the house that he rose for the third time to explain the provisions of the fifth bill that within the last three years had been brought into parliament for the settlement of Irish tithes. This measure had no better success in the present than in the preceding session.

4. Mr. Pryme withdrew his motion in the commons, the object of which was an inquiry, by a royal commission, into the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, on receiving an intimation from Mr. Rice that inquiry was necessary, and that the crown, when it thought fit, had ample power to institute it. The subject was mentioned in the lords on the 8th, when the duke of Wellington said that the heads of the universities were considering the subject, with a view to alteration.

5. On lord Melbourne moving that the house go into committee on the Irish municipal bill, the duke of Wellington said, that the bill had a tendency to injure that church establishment, which it had been the policy of England for 300 years to uphold; and that as there were several other measures in the commons affecting the interests of the church, the house should wait till they had all the bills together. He therefore moved to postpone the bill to the 9th June, which was carried by 192 to 115. On June 9th lord Lyndhurst moved a further postponement to the 3rd July, and in the interval the king died. Parliament was soon after dissolved.

8. Louis Philip publishes an ordinance, granting, with certain exceptions, pardon to all persons convicted of political offences, and commuting the sentence of death pronounced by the court of peers on Meunier into one of banishment for 10 years. The amnesty gave much satisfaction to the French people.

9. Lord Brongham enters his protest on the journals of the house of lords against the ministerial resolutions respecting Canada. (See March 6.)

11. Sir Francis Burdett re-elected for Westminster. A large portion of the constituency of this city having become dissatisfied with the political conduct of their representative, in the abandonment of radical, and the adoption of conservative principles, called upon him to resign his seat, by resolutions passed at a public meeting. This call the baronet answered by accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, and again presenting himself as a candidate for Westminster. J. T. Leader, M.P. for Bridgewater, having been previously invited to stand, resigned in like manner, and opposed sir Francis Burdett. The result was looked to with interest, as a trial of political strength. On the close of the poll the numbers were, Burdett, 3460; Leader, 2874; majority, 586.

15. Brilliant successes were obtained about this period over the Carlists. On the 15th Espartero drove them from Hernani. On the 17th the British legion under general Evans carried Irun by assault, after a desperate resistance. Next day the fortress of Fuentarabia surrendered to the British troops.

16. Great Yorkshire meeting, held on Hartshead-moor, near Huddersfield, a requisition having been presented to the lord-lieutenant of the county, signed by upwards of 4000 householders, to consider the principles and operation of the New Poor Law. Most of the townships of the West Riding attended, accompanied with bands of music and flags, inscribed with mottoes; such as, "To smite the poor, is treason against God." "Can the christian man bastile the poor?" "Those whom God has joined, let no man put asunder." "He, that oppresseth the poor to increase his wealth, shall surely come to want." "The poor have a right to a subsistence from the land." The number assembled was estimated at near 100,000. Mr. Oastler, the Rev. J. R. Stephens, and Mr. Robert Owen, were the chief speakers. Resolutions were passed condemning the poor-law, and in accordance with the scriptural mottoes inscribed on the banners.

24. Being the eighteenth anniversary of the birth-day of the Princess Victoria, and also the day on which by act of parliament she attained her majority in the event of the king's death, a great number of congratulatory addresses were presented to her, and the day was kept as a holiday. There was an illumination in the evening, and a state-ball given at St. James's palace. Indisposition, and recent deaths in the families of the king and queen prevented the attendance of their majesties.

27. Three burglars are brought before the court of king's bench, on a writ of error, and claim their discharge on the ground that they had been sentenced to be transported by an inferior court, when they ought to have been sentenced to be hanged. The court allows the validity of the objection, and the prisoners are liberated.

30. A meeting is held at Birmingham, to take into consideration a memorial signed by 12,000 or 13,000 workmen of that town, complaining of distress in consequence of the American failures.

The duke of Orleans, eldest son of the king of the French, is married at Fontainebleau to the princess Helena of Mecklenburg. During the rejoicings in consequence of this marriage a fortnight after, 24 persons were suffocated by the pressure of the crowd, in passing through the gates of the Champ de Mars.

31. A fancy fair is held in the Hanover-square Rooms, under the patronage of several ladies of the Romish persuasion, for the purpose of raising funds for the completion of a new Romish chapel at Brentwood.

The Prussian government has lately issued an order, that every functionary who shall be convicted of having been drunk, shall be instantly dismissed from the public service.

June 1. A ball at the king's theatre for the relief of the Spitalfields weavers.

7. Explosion of the boilers of a Hull steam-packet, with about 150 passengers on board, many of whom are killed or wounded.

9. A bulletin is published, announcing that his majesty has suffered for some time from an affection of the chest, which had produced considerable weakness.

10. The New York banks, and subsequently all banks throughout the United States, suspend payments in specie.

16. The revised constitution of the Spanish monarchy proclaimed. (See Feb. 24.) On the 19th the queen-regent published a general amnesty.

20. General Evans arrived in London from Spain, having retired from the command of the British auxiliary legion.

DEATH OF WILLIAM IV.—The tolling of the great bell at the Castle awakened the inhabitants of Windsor at 4 o'clock this morning, to the melancholy knowledge that their excellent sovereign was no more. At the usual hour the royal standard was hoisted on the Round Tower, but only to half its usual height, and shortly afterwards the streets were filled with groups of persons discussing the merits, and lamenting the loss of the good old king, of whom they were suddenly, though not unexpectedly, bereaved. His majesty expired at 12 minutes past 2 o'clock, on Tuesday morning, the twentieth instant, in the presence of the archbishop of Canterbury, the dean of Hereford, &c. On Sunday he received the sacrament from the archbishop. He had expressed a wish to survive the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo on the 18th, and so far was gratified. But a distressing cough, extreme oppression in breathing, and very languid circulation, left little hope of recovery. He was lethargic, but conscious to the last of the presence of those on whom his affections were fixed. He was fervent in his expressions of religious hope, and just before breathing his last, faintly articulated, "Thy will be done." The queen had been unremitting in her attentions; was scarcely ever absent from the sick chamber, and for twelve days did not take off her clothes. The humblest person in the realm could not have exceeded her in condescension, and in the kind offices she rendered to her afflicted consort. A post mortem examination showed the nature of the disease; exhibiting a general tendency to ossification and decay about the heart, the lungs, and other vital organs. His majesty was in the 73rd year of his age, and had completed within a few days the seventh year of his reign. By his death, and consequent accession to the throne of his royal niece, the princess Victoria, the crowns of the United Kingdom and of Hanover are dissevered through the operation of the salic law excluding females from the Hanoverian kingdom, and which descends to the next heir, the duke of Cumberland. A parliamentary provision was made for queen Adelaide, now queen-dowager, in 1831, under which 100,000*l.* per annum is settled upon her for life, with Marlborough house and Bushy-house for residences. The king left by will 2000*l.* to each of his sons and daughters. A sum of 40,000*l.* to be reserved in virtue of a life-policy is vested in trustees.

PUBLIC STATUTES. I. TO VII.
WILLIAM IV.

1 Wm. 4. c. 36. Alters and amends the law regarding commitments by courts of equity for contempt, and taking bills pro confesso.

Cap. 40. Provides that the undisposed residue of testators' estates shall go to the executors, as trustees, for the next of kin, unless executors were intended to take beneficially.

Cap. 47. Consolidates and amends the law for facilitating the payment of debts out of real estate.

Cap. 51. Repeals the beer duties.

Cap. 58. Regulates fees in superior courts.

Cap. 64. Regulates the sale of beer; allows beer to be sold by taking out a license from the excise; before, it was necessary to have a license from magistrates in session. (See p. 891, 955.)

Cap. 66. Consolidates the forgery laws; abolishes capital punishment, except in cases of forging wills, or powers of attorney to transfer stock. (By a later statute, death punishment is entirely abolished for forgery.)

Cap. 68. Limits liability of mail-contractors, stage-coach proprietors, and carriers for the loss or injury to packages delivered to them for conveyance, and the value or contents of which is not declared to them by the owners.

Cap. 70. For the more effectual administration of justice in England and Wales; empowers the king to appoint an additional judge in the courts of king's bench, common pleas, and exchequer; regulates the commencement and end of terms, namely, that Hilary term shall begin Jan. 11, and end Jan. 31; Easter term April 15, and end May 8; Trinity term, May 22nd, and end June 12; and Michaelmas term shall begin on the 2nd, and end on the 25th of November. The act regulates the holding of general quarter sessions of the peace; by providing that they shall be held in the first weeks after October 11, December 28, March 31, and June 24. (By a later statute, justices may alter time of holding the April sessions to between March 7, and April 22, to prevent their interference with the spring assizes.) The jurisdiction of the superior courts at Westminster is extended to the county palatine of Chester, and the county of the city of Chester, and to the principality of Wales, and these separate provincial jurisdictions abolished.

Cap. 73. Repeals so much of 60 Geo. 3, c. 8, as inflicts the punishment of banishment for the publication of a blasphemous or seditious libel a second time; but requires greater securities from the publishers of newspapers and political pamphlets.

1 Wm. 4, c. 8, sess. 2. Office of postmaster-general of Ireland abolished, and united to that of Great Britain.

Cap. 22. Extends powers of 13 Geo. 3, c. 63, relative to the examination of witnesses by interrogatories in India, to all British colonies, and to the judges of the several courts therein, and the courts at Westminster.

Cap. 25. Civil list act; the disbursements of the civil list divided into five classes, for which the allowances are as follow:—Their majesties' privy purse, 110,000*l.*; salaries of his majesty's household, 130,390*l.*; expenses of his majesty's

1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 11. Makes a provision for the queen in case she survive the king, by granting her majesty a life annuity of 100,000*l.*; with Marlborough house, and the rangerhip of Bushy Park.

Cap. 13. Prohibits the growth and culture of tobacco in Ireland.

Cap. 17. For the better government of Ireland, lord lieutenant may appoint lieutenants of counties; who, with their deputies, shall have the same powers as governors or deputies had heretofore. Deputy lieutenants to possess a freehold qualification of 200*l.* per annum.

Cap. 19. Duties on candles repealed, and the makers put on the same footing as melters of tallow.

Cap. 30. Equalizes the wine duties; for the produce of the Cape of Good Hope, 2*s.* 9*d.* per gallon; all other wines, 5*s.* 6*d.*

Cap. 32. Makes important alterations in the game laws. "Defines 'game'" to include hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor game, black game, or bustards. Dispenses with qualifications, and allows every certificated person to kill game, liable to the ordinary proceedings in case of trespass. Certificated person may sell game, (game was not before saleable,) and take out licenses to deal in game.

Cap. 33. Authorizes the advance of 500,000*l.*, in exchequer bills, for the promotion of public works in Ireland.

Cap. 37. Abolishes the truck system, and prohibits the payment in certain trades of wages in goods, or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm.

Cap. 56. Establishes the "court of bankruptcy."

Cap. 60. Regulates parish vestries.

2 Wm. 4, c. 9. For the establishment of fever hospitals, and the prevention of contagious fevers in Ireland.

Cap. 10. For the prevention of the spasmodic or Indian cholera in England (see p. 911).

Cap. 17. For amending the law relative to the sub-letting of land in Ireland. Lesses sub-letting, without the consent of their landlords, not to have any remedy for the rent or occupation of the land. On failure of the payment of the rent by the lessee, the landlord may give notice to sub-tenants to pay their rents to him, which payment on receipt will discharge all parties.

Cap. 34. Consolidates the coin laws.

Cap. 41. For the relief of the Irish clergy who are distressed, owing to the combination against the payment of tithes; lord lieutenant, empowered, on petition, to make advances to clergy, not exceeding two-thirds of the amount of tithes in arrears, nor exceeding 500*l.* to one individual.

Cap. 45. Parliamentary reform act (see p. 919).

2 & 3 Wm. c. 62. Abolishes punishment of death for stealing in a dwelling-house and for cattle-stealing. Persons transported, not to have a ticket of leave, or receive remission of punishment, unless, if transported for seven years, they shall have served four; if transported for fourteen years, till they shall have served six; or if for life, have served eight years. Convicts not eligible to hold property till pardoned.

Cap. 71. Shortens the term of prescriptive rights, and makes alteration in the old rule of law as to "time immemorial." No right of common shall be defeated after thirty years' enjoyment. In claims of right of way, use thereof for twenty or forty years sufficient; the use of light to any house or building enjoyed for twenty years, becomes indefeasible, unless shown to have been by consent.

Cap. 75. Regulates schools of anatomy and the supply of anatomical subjects; inspectors to be appointed; bodies of murderers prohibited to be dissected, such to be ignominiously buried within the precincts of the prison.

Cap. 111. Abolishes certain sinecures in the court of chancery; in lieu of such patronage the retiring pension of the lord chancellor, augmented from 4000*l.* to 5000*l.* per annum.

Cap. 116. Fixes the salaries of the judges as follows:—to the chief justice of king's bench (since reduced) 10,000*l.*; of the common pleas, 8000*l.*; to the chief baron, 7000*l.*; to each puisne judge, 5000*l.*; to the lord chancellor of Ireland, 8000*l.*; to the chief-justice of king's bench, Ireland, 5074*l.*; of the common pleas, 4612*l.*; of the chief-baron, 4612*l.*; and to each of the Irish puisne judges, 3688*l.*, to be in lieu of all fees. Salary of lord lieutenant of Ireland to be 20,000*l.*

3 Wm. 4. c. 15. Gives to the author, or his assign, of any tragedy, comedy, farce, or other dramatic entertainment, the sole right of representing, or causing the same to be represented, in any part of the United Kingdom, for the term of twenty-eight years absolutely, or during his life, if he survive that period.

3 & 4 Wm. 4. c. 23. Repeals duty on receipts for sums under 5*l.*, and reduces duty on advertisements in newspapers from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* 6*d.*

Cap. 27. Limits actions and suits relative to real property; abolishes all real actions except writs of dower, quare impedit and ejectment; and limits period for recovery of land or rent to twenty years.

* Cap. 47. Relates to Irish church (see p. 937).

Cap. 41. Improves administration of justice in privy-council, by the appointment of a "judicial committee," consisting of the lord-chancellor, chief-justices, and other judges; and also transfers appeals from vice-admiralty court to privy council.

Cap. 42. Effects improvements in judicial administration; empowers judges to alter mode of pleading in superior courts; limits actions of debt on specialties; abolishes wager of law; empowers jury to allow interest on debts; extends the power of arbitrators under submissions which are rules of court; abolishes all holidays in courts of justice except Sundays, Christmas-day and the three following days, and Monday and Tuesday in Easter week.

Cap. 44. Abolishes capital punishment for breaking into a dwelling-house and stealing therein; substituting transportation.

Cap. 73. Abolishes slavery in the British colonies, and provides compensation for the slave-owners (see p. 938).

* Cap. 83. Requires banks issuing notes payable to bearer on demand to make quarterly returns of the amount of their notes in circulation.

Cap. 85. Renews charter of East India company for effecting an arrangement with the East India company and the better government of India (see p. 939).

Cap. 98. Renews charter of the bank of England (see p. 939).

Cap. 103. Regulates labour of children in the mills and factories of the United Kingdom. No person under eighteen years of age to work in the night, that is between half-past eight o'clock in the evening and half-past five o'clock in the morning; nor to work more than twelve hours in one day, or sixty-nine hours in one week; and one hour and a half per day to be allowed for meals. Employment of children under nine years old prohibited except in silk mills. Holidays to be allowed. Inspectors of factories appointed. All such pensions only to be granted on application, accompanied with a declaration to the effect that the private fortune of the applicant is otherwise insufficient to maintain his station in life. No superannuation allowance to be granted to any officer or clerk under sixty-five years of age, unless upon certificate from the head of his department and from two medical practitioners, that he is unable from infirmity of body or mind to discharge the duties of his office. Act not to give an absolute right to these allowances, or to prevent dismissal of persons for misconduct without compensation.

Cap. 29. Facilitates the loan of money upon landed securities in Ireland, where the preamble states capital is less abundant, and interest higher, than in England, and landed property has become more secure than heretofore; by empowering persons who under any direction, trust, or power, are authorized to lend money in Britain, to lend the same in Ireland. Consent of persons interested, however, must be first obtained.

Cap. 30. Facilitates the exchange of lands lying in common fields.

Cap. 31. Reduces four per cent. stock to three and a half; such new 3*l.* 10*s.* stock not to be liable to redemption till Jan. 6, 1840.

Cap. 32. Reduces the tonnage duties payable in the port of London.

Cap. 34. Abolishes the sixpence per month deducted from the wages of seamen for the support of Greenwich Hospital, and in lieu grants 22,000*l.* annually, payable out of the consolidated fund.

Cap. 36. Establishes the central criminal court (see p. 955).

4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 48. All business relating to the assessment and application of the county-rates shall be transacted in open court; of which notice shall be given two weeks before.

Cap. 59. Repeals duty on almanacs.

Cap. 67. Abolishes capital punishment for returning from transportation; substituting transportation for life.

Cap. 76. Poor laws amendment act (see p. 955).

Cap. 94. Empowers the crown by letters patent to invest trading and other companies, though not incorporated by royal charter, with authority to maintain and defend actions at law, in the name of one of their officers. List of members' names, with places of their abode, to be filed with clerk of patents, and be open for inspection.

Cap. 95. Empowers the crown to erect that part of South Australia which lies between the 132nd and 141st degrees of east longitude, and between the Southern Ocean and 26 degrees of south latitude, into a British province for the purpose of colonization. Persons resident in the colony to make laws, appoint officers, and levy rates and taxes; such laws to be laid before the king in council. Commissioners may be appointed for the purposes of the act. Lands to be open to purchase by British subjects, at not less than 12*s.* per acre; purchase-money to form a fund for conducting the emigration of poor persons from Britain or Ireland; emigrants, as far as possible, to be adult persons of the two sexes in equal proportion, and not above thirty years old; no emigrant to be allowed a free passage unless his family be also conveyed. Constitution to be established by the crown, when the inhabitants amount to 50,000. Money may be borrowed for conveying emigrants, and for defraying expenses of colony. Convicts not to be transported to the South Australian colony.

5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 19. Amends and consolidates the laws relating to merchant seamen. No seaman to be employed in any registered ship of the burthen of 80 tons and upwards without a written agreement, specifying the wages he is to receive, the capacity in which he is to act, and the nature of the voyage. Ships going abroad to have a supply of medicines, and seamen hurt in the service to have advice and medical aid gratis. Register-office to be established at the custom-house, under the direction of the Admiralty, of all the seafaring men of the United Kingdom. Ships to have apprentices proportioned to their tonnage. Parish boys of the age of thirteen, and of sufficient health and strength (of which the justices are to judge), may, with their consent, be bound apprentices in the sea service.

Cap. 23. Establishes loan societies for the benefit of the labouring classes; property of society vested in trustees; loan advanced to any individual not to exceed 15*l*., and no second loan to be advanced until the previous one has been repaid.

Cap. 25. Encourages voluntary enlistment into the royal navy, by limiting the period of service to five years, unless in case of special emergency, when they may be detained six months longer, with one-fourth increase of pay.

Cap. 36. The time of taking the poll in boroughs in parliamentary elections, in England and Wales, limited to one day, commencing at eight o'clock in the forenoon, and closing at four o'clock in the afternoon.

Cap. 78. Duration of the poll in elections in Scotland is similarly limited to one day. Under the Reform Acts two days were the appointed time.

Cap. 38. Effects greater uniformity of practice in the government of prisons in England and Wales; copies of prison rules to be transmitted to secretary of state, who may alter the same; inspectors, not exceeding five in number, to be appointed by secretary of state, with power to visit any prison, gaol, and house of correction in Great Britain.

Cap. 50. Consolidates and amends laws relative to highways, and directs that surveyors be annually elected by the parishioners, at their first vestry meeting for the nomination of overseers of the poor. Salaried surveyor may be appointed. Parishes may be formed into districts, and a district surveyor be chosen. When any railway crosses the highway, gates to be erected. Penalties as to nuisances, for not painting the names of owners of waggons, carts, &c., thereon.

Cap. 59. Persons wantonly and cruelly beating or otherwise ill-treating any cattle, (dogs included) or domestic animal, or improperly driving the same, whereby any mischief is done, shall, exclusive of the damage, pay a fine not exceeding 40*s*. Keeping a place for baiting bulls, dogs, bears, or other animals, or for cock-fighting, subjects to a penalty. Cattle impounded must be fed; to prevent the re-sale of old and diseased horses sold to knackers or slaughtermen, they are required to kill them within three days after purchase, and in the meanwhile provide them with food.

Cap. 62. Empowers the lords of the treasury to substitute a declaration for the oaths taken in their department. Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and other corporate bodies may substitute a declaration in lieu of oaths. Churchwardens' and sidesmen's oath abolished, and oaths and affidavits of persons acting in turnpike trusts. Declarations substituted for oaths and affidavits required on taking out a patent; by acts as to pawnbrokers; but the penalties of such acts apply to declarations. Declaration substituted for oaths and affidavits required by Bank of England on the transfer of stock; and in suits in the colonies. Declaration in writing sufficient to prove the execution of any will, codicil, deed, &c. The practice of magistrates receiving voluntary oaths relative to matters not the subject of judicial inquiry is prohibited. Making a false declaration is a misdemeanor.

Cap. 65. Author of a lecture secured in the sole right of printing or publishing the same; printers of newspapers publishing lectures without leave subject to penalty. Act does not extend to lectures, of the delivering of which notice has not been given to two justices, living within five miles from the place, two days at least before the delivery of the same.

Cap. 76. Reform of Municipal Corporations (see p. 972).

Cap. 83. Amends patent laws (see p. 982).

6 & 7. Wm. 4. c. 30. Abolishes the law requiring that murderers shall be executed on the day next but one after that on which sentence has been passed, and directs that the judge shall proceed on conviction of murder as in all other capital offences.

Cap. 37. Regulates the sale of bread; imposes penalties for adulteration, fraudulent weights, and baking on Sundays.

Cap. 71. For commutation of tithes see p. 1006.

Cap. 76. Reduces stamp-duty on newspapers (see p. p. 997, 1008).

Cap. 85. Marriages in England (see p. 1006).

Cap. 69. Empowers coroners to summon medical witnesses, and to direct a post mortem examination; and the jury may require the coroner to summon additional evidence, if they think necessary.

Cap. 102. For facilitating the poll at county elections, additional polling-places may be appointed upon petition from justices assembled in quarter sessions; sheriff to provide one polling-booth for every 450 electors.

Cap. 110. By 54 Geo. 3, c. 156, eleven copies of every published book are required to be gratuitously delivered to eleven public libraries. So much of this act is repealed as requires copies to be presented to Sion College, the four universities of Scotland, and the King's Inns library at Dublin.

Cap. 114. The anomaly in jurisprudence which allowed counsel in civil actions, in misdemeanors, and high treason, but not in felony, is removed, and all persons tried for felonies are allowed to make their defence by counsel, or attorney in courts where attorneys practise as counsel. In cases of summary conviction accused may make their defence and examine and cross-examine witness by counsel or attorney. Copies of depositions to be allowed the accused on payment of a sum not exceeding three half-pence for each folio of ninety words; application for such depositions to be made prior to the day appointed for the commencement of the sessions or assize.

7 Wm. 4, c. 5. Enacts that leasg-making, sedition, and blasphemy shall be punished in Scotland, as in England, and abolishes the punishment of banishment, to which any person convicted a second time of such crimes was liable.

FINANCE, TAXES, RETRENCHMENTS.

The policy of lightening the fiscal burdens of the people, which commenced in the last reign, was pursued in the present with augmented energy. The remission of the beer duties and the intire opening of the trade therein, were a popular beginning of king William's government. The inhabited house-duty, which was alleged to be partially assessed, and which pressed heavily on the middle ranks living in towns, was abolished. The repeal of taxes that bore chiefly on the agricultural classes had formed an object of especial attention ever since the peace. The agricultural taxes repealed from 1815 to the end of 1835 amounted to 985,824*l.* per annum, and the amount of savings to the agriculturists by these reductions during this period were calculated to amount to 12,929,577*l.* But the most effective relief afforded to this interest accrued from the reduction in the poor-rate assessment under the operation of the new poor law act. Several duties that were either unequal in their operation, or impolitic in their tendency, were reduced. Of the former description was the duty upon coals carried coastwise, which acted in aggravation of the natural disadvantage experienced by the inhabitants of those parts of the country where fuel is scarce; and of impolitic duties rescinded may be mentioned those on printed cottons, and the discriminating duties upon sugar and coffee, the produce of British India, together with a host of petty duties, of excise or customs, which were either repealed or reduced; as those on candles, starch, stone bottles, sweets, soap, tiles, hemp, cotton-wool, drugs, oil, and imported books. The abolition of the duty on almanacs and pamphlets, and its reduction on newspapers, were popular concessions to public opinion.

The alterations made in the tariff can only be deemed the commencement of a new and better system. Although England has been forward to advocate a free trade among nations, and is more deeply interested than any state in its universal adoption, she has only offered a tardy example to her neighbours. Her statesmen have harangued on the justice and utility of unrestricted intercourse, but have been slow to enforce its practical application. The corn-laws offer a prominent exception to the general theory of an unfettered exchange with neighbouring states. Not only is agriculture, but manufactures are protected, and the custom-house accounts exhibit a long array of articles on which duties are levied for the supposed encouragement of domestic industry. That these imposts are levied as protective duties, not as sources of public revenue, is attested by the fact that, in 1836, in a list of 190 articles and upwards, there were only eight—tea, sugar, tobacco, foreign spirits, wine, timber, coffee, and cotton-wool—that essentially contributed to the national income.

The economical reductions effected in this short reign were very extensive. At one sweep the expenditure of the navy was reduced 1,220,000*l.* The salaries of the king's ministers, ambassadors and consuls, the chief justices, the attorney and solicitor-general, and in general, all salaries above 1000*l.*, were cut down. The charge for salaries in the various public departments, exclusive of army and navy, &c., since the peace, had been reduced nearly a million; it being 3,763,100*l.* in 1815, and 2,786,278*l.* in 1835. The reductions made in the eight years from 1827 to 1835 amounted to 2101 persons and 563,290*l.* of annual charge; or eight per cent. in number and nearly 17 per cent. in amount. Various savings were effected by the consolidation of offices and boards, as those of stamps and taxes. Previous to the settlement of the king's civil list, the royal expenditure underwent a searching investigation; and though no great saving was effected, its details were simplified by the transfer of various charges unconnected with the regal dignity to the consolidated fund.

The progress of reduction in taxation since the war will appear from the subjoined statement, collected from the tables of Mr. Porter, of the yearly amount of the taxes imposed and reduced from 1815 to 1836:—

Year.	Imposed.	Reduced.
1815 . . .	£176,772	£222,749
1816 . . .	375,058	17,547,365
1817 . . .	7,991	36,495
1818 . . .	1,356	9,504
1819 . . .	3,102,302	269,484
1820 . . .	119,602	4,000
1821 . . .	44,842	471,309
1822 . . .		2,139,101
1823 . . .	18,596	4,185,735
1824 . . .	49,605	1,801,333
1825 . . .	48,100	3,676,239
1826 . . .	188,725	1,967,215
1827 . . .	21,402	84,038
1828 . . .	1,966	51,998
1829 . . .		126,406
1830 . . .	696,024	4,070,742
1831 . . .	627,586	1,588,652
1832 . . .	44,526	747,264
1833 . . .		1,532,128
1834 . . .	198,394	2,064,516
1835 . . .	5,575	162,977
1836 . . .	3,721	1,021,786

Mr. Porter shows that the amount of taxes repealed since 1814 exceeds the amount of those imposed since 1801 by more than 6½ millions (Progress of the Nation, ii. 306). This is so far satisfactory: but it appears that the share of taxed articles obtained by each member of the community has only increased in a trifling degree, not exceeding one-seventh; which is extraordinary, considering the vast increase in riches and in the means of purchasing during the last 35 years. The stamp-duties and assessed taxes, which indicate the increase of property, have increased faster than the customs and excise, which indicate the increase of consumption. Wealth has accumulated, unaccompanied with a proportionate increase in the national disposition to expenditure.

The following is the income and expenditure of the United Kingdom during the present reign:—

Year.	Income.	Expenditure.
1830 . . .	£50,056,616	£49,078,108
1831 . . .	46,424,440	49,797,156
1832 . . .	47,322,744	46,379,692
1833 . . .	46,271,326	45,782,026
1834 . . .	46,425,263	46,678,079
1835 . . .	45,893,369	45,669,309

It is calculated that the customs and excise contribute 72 per cent. of the whole revenue; the stamps 14 per cent.; the assessed and land taxes 9 per cent.; and the post-office 5 per cent. The rate per cent. for which the gross revenue was collected in 1835 in Britain was 6*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*: namely, customs 5*l.* 5*s.*; excise 6*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*; stamps 2*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*; taxes 5*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*; post-office 27*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*; tax on pensions and salaries 2*l.* 2*s.* 0*d.*; crown-lands 10*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*. The rate per cent. at which the gross receipts for revenue were collected in Ireland, in 1835, amounted to 11*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*: namely, customs 12*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*; excise 9*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*; stamps 5*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*; post-office 39*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*.

In 1834 the total charge of the funded and unfunded debt was 28,510,708*l.*; in 1835, 28,494,827*l.*; in 1836, 28,505,675*l.*; and January 5, 1837, 29,234,873*l.*: so that the total reduction in the charge of the national obligations, from the peace, has been to the amount of 4,237,937*l.* Almost the whole of this reduction has been effected, not by the application of surplus revenue to the payment of the principal of the debt, but in consequence of the improvement in public credit, and fall in the interest of money since the termination of the war. In 1816 the 3 per cent. stock was only 58; in 1825 it had risen to 94; and in 1834 it was at 87. This favourable state of the money-market enabled the chancellor of the exchequer to effect reductions in the amount and interest of exchequer bills, and important savings, by the conversion of stocks of a higher into a lower denomination. The savings made by the latter operations, since 1822, exceed one half of the decrease in the charge of the debt since 1815. The following is an account of the savings which have accrued to the public from the conversion of stocks from a higher to a lower rate of interest:—

The increase in the charge of the national debt, subsequent to 1833, has been chiefly occasioned by the measures of public reform adopted by the legislature since that period; by the repayment of one-fourth of the capital of the bank of England in 1834; by the 20,000,000*l.* West India loan in 1835-6; and by the creations of stock to answer debt due to savings' banks in 1836, 1837, and 1838.

COMMERCE, SHIPPING, NAVIGATION.

Commercial prosperity, as remarked at the close of the former reign (p. 837), is not measured by the amount or excess of exports, but by the aggregate amount of imports and exports. The commodities a nation imports are as conducive to her interests as those she exports, and it is the magnitude of the two conjointly that indicates industrial activity and national enjoyment. The balance of trade, as it is called, may be against a country, as it often is in colonies and infant states, and yet that country be rapidly progressing in wealth, industry, population, and all the other elements of internal strength and social happiness. Reciprocal dependence is the surest bond of peace and friendly feeling, both among nations and individuals; and it is not to native resources, to an utter independence of neighbours, that each state ought to intrust its welfare, but in the greatest possible interchange of peculiar advantages, products, and conveniences. By impoverishing and exhausting others we do not enrich ourselves. Commerce that is wholesome is not gambling, but an interchange of benefits; and that intercourse is likely to be most lasting, the least alloyed with jealousy, the most conservative of international amity, and mutually the most advantageous, that resolves itself, as all commercial exchanges ultimately must do, into mere barter,—an equal and reciprocal exchange of commodities, without leaving any general balance on either side to be liquidated by money.

Another principle which the history of British commerce, since the beginning of the century, strikingly elucidates, is the irrelevance of the money or declared value of exports, as an index of commercial activity. This is merely the price of the commodities, which varies with the state of the market and the cost of production, and has no relation to the quantities exported. But the quantities are the chief point of interest—the only test of industrial prosperity. During the last forty years, the real—so called in the genuine mercantile spirit—or money value of our exports has been stationary or declining, but no one infers hence that commerce has declined; that it has not been prosperous in an unprecedented degree; that agriculture has not thereby been vastly promoted, and that it has not been the chief source of national riches, domestic improvements, and augmented employment for the population, shipping, navigation, roads, turnpikes, and conveyances of every description. These are the only results interesting to the statesman and legislator; the rest are merely the symbols of the custom-house, of no more importance in estimating the action of trade on the well-being of the community than the ancient talles of the exchequer.

Having premised these explanations, we subjoin, in continuation of the tables of previous reigns, the following account of the trade of the United Kingdom to January 1837; exhibiting the official value of imports of foreign and colonial produce, and of British, Irish, foreign, and colonial produce exported:—

Years.	Exports.	Imports.
1831	71,429,004	49,713,869
1832	76,071,591	44,586,741

1832	£79,823,092	£45,952,551
1834	88,393,586	49,362,811
1836	97,621,548	57,023,867

The magnitude of foreign trade, and the enormous increase in the export of native produce, in the present reign, has never been exceeded. In the short term of seven years, from 1831 to 1836 inclusive, the exports increased 40 per cent., and the imports 23 per cent. The actual or declared value of exports in 1830 was £38,271,597*l.* in 1836, 53,368,571*l.* Of the enormous amount of 97,621,548*l.* of exports in 1836, only 12,391,711*l.* was foreign and colonial merchandise re-exported; the remaining 85,229,837*l.* consisting entirely of British and Irish produce and manufactures.

In 1836 trade was pushed to its maximum state. It was a year of speculation and over-trading both in exports and imports, and the consequence was the re-action of 1837 and the extensive mercantile failures already described in the occurrences of that year (p. 1015). The exports of native produce and manufactures dropped in 1837 to 72,312,207*l.*, being a decrease of 12,917,650*l.* This check was of short duration. In 1838 pecuniary transactions with America were re-established by the resumption of specie payments by the banks of the United States, and British commerce again commenced its wonted onward movement.

Since the peace the SHIPOWNERS had complained of the decline of their interest; of the relaxations introduced in 1822 by Mr. Wallace, the president of the board of trade, in the navigation laws and colonial trade, and of the encouragement thereby given to foreigners, with whom it was alleged to be impossible to compete, owing to the greater cheapness abroad than at home of labour and the materials of ship-building. These apprehensions have proved illusive, and the liberal policy determined upon by the government has proved as beneficial to the shipping interest, as it was just and unavoidable towards other countries. The proportion of British to foreign tonnage entering the ports of the United Kingdom is greater now than under the more restrictive system; for the former, from 1826 to 1836, has increased 23 per cent., while the increase of the latter has been exactly one half that rate, or 11½ per cent.

The following statement of the number of vessels belonging to the British empire in each year from 1803 will show the progress of our mercantile navy. It is chiefly extracted from the valuable tables of Mr. Porter. During the war many vessels were employed in the transport service, and a greater number was requisite for a given amount of traffic than in peace.

The records of 1812 and 1813 were destroyed at the burning of the custom-house. In 1827 a new mode of registration was adopted; previously to that year many vessels that had been lost were still continued in the registry.

Of the 26,037 vessels registered belonging to the empire, in 1837, there belonged to England 14,998; Scotland, 3244; Ireland, 1694; Guernsey, 90; Jersey, 245; Isle of Man, 265; British plantations, 5501: the number of men and boys employed in navigating the whole was 173,506.

The year 1836 was one of such general and unexampled commercial activity, that it seems to claim a more detailed illustration. A statement is subjoined of the declared value of British and Irish products exported that year, specifying the countries to which they were sent. The sum of 160,722*l.*, affixed to Prussia, expresses only the value of the commodities exported direct to Prussian ports; most British goods that find their way to Prussia pass through the Netherlands to the Rhenish provinces, or in still greater quantities are shipped to Hamburg and other ports in the north of Germany, whence they are forwarded by land-carriage to the interior. The statement of exports to Spain is like-

Among the mercantile impulses of the present reign may be reckoned the intire opening, in 1834, of the trade with India and China. This traffic is still in its infancy, and it is impossible to assign the limits to which it may be carried by individual vigilance and enterprise. One public advantage has already resulted in the reduction in the price and improvement in the quality of the tea consumed by the community. The future supply of cotton from the East will probably increase, and the repeal, in 1833, of the discriminative duties levied on sugar and coffee, the produce of India, for the benefit of the West India planter, and to the detriment of the consumer, holds out additional encouragements to oriental commerce.

The formation of the Prusso-Bavarian league, under the name of Zoll Verein, appears to have been viewed with needless jealousy. Up to the present the regulations of the union have been fiscal only and limited to the removal of the obstructions that impeded the transit of merchandise through the adjoining states. During the first four years of the existence of the league the average amount of British and Irish commodities exported to Germany has increased as mentioned on a former occasion (p. 971, 881).

A peculiarity in the commercial history of the present and former reigns, which has been lately adverted to by Sir William Molesworth (House of Commons, March 13, 1839), deserves to be remarked. Foreigners have taken in greater quantities than ever, supplies of our cottons, linens, woollens, and hardware. But, though the export of all these manufactured articles has largely increased, the export of them, either in an intermediate stage of manufacture, or in that of the raw material, has increased in a much faster proportion. Thus, take cotton for an example. Comparing the four years ending with 1828 with the last four years, the increase in the value of our trade in cotton goods has been 22 per cent., in cotton yarn 90 per cent., or four times as much. In comparing the last four years with the four years previous to 1828, the exports of hardware have increased 32 per cent. in value, those of iron and steel, 89 per cent., exceeding twice as much. The exportation of woollen yarn and of British wool was prohibited till the close of 1824. Comparing the average of the four subsequent years with those of the four years ending with 1833, it appears that, whilst the aggregate value of the exports of woollen manufactures had increased only 16 per cent., that of woollen yarn had increased 939 per cent., and of wool 1161 per cent.; that is, the ratio of the increase of the exports of the raw material, and of the half-manufactured commodity, had been fifty times as great as that of our once highly esteemed cloths. The trade in linens, upon the whole, has been the most flourishing of any; since 1828 it has increased in value 42 per cent., but even in this case the export of the half-manufactured commodity has been more remarkable than in any other. The trade in linen yarn has grown up since 1832, in which year the aggregate value of linen yarn exported was only 8705*l.*; in the next year it was 72,006*l.*; in 1834, 136,312*l.*; in 1835, 216,635*l.*; in 1836, 318,772*l.*; in 1837, 478,000*l.*; and in 1838 it amounted to 655,000*l.*: an increase of about 50 per cent. per annum for the last five years. Almost the whole of this article was sent to France, where it was wrought up into cambrics, and the other finer descriptions of the linen manufacture, in which the French are unrivalled. Comparing the whole of our foreign trade, it appears that, on the average of the four years ending 1828, the actual value of our exports was 35,368,000*l.*; on the average of the four years ending 1838, 49,645,000*l.*: showing an increase of 5,277,000*l.* or about 14 per cent. But of that increase, 3,094,000*l.* worth was of cotton yarn; 2,000,000*l.* of linen and woollen yarn, wool, iron, and steel, making in all 5,000,000*l.* or a little less than the whole increase of our exports in the last 10 years. While therefore the aggregate of our exports has increased 14 per cent., the increase of the exports of the primary materials of foreign manufactures has been 107 per cent., or eight times as much.

The explanation of this mercantile revolution will be chiefly found in the superior mechanical resources of England, especially in our unequalled spinning machinery, by which we are enabled to prepare, cheapest and best, the bases of the continental fabrics; while, on the other hand, in carrying through the ulterior processes of manufacture, requiring a greater proportion of manual labour, the foreign has an advantage over the English manufacturer in the lower rate of wages, the consequence of cheaper food, less burdensome taxes and rates, and, in many places abroad, an inferior standard of diet and domestic comforts.

The commercial intercourse with IRELAND exceeds in importance that carried on with any foreign state, and her rapidly increasing resources promise to lessen our future dependence on foreigners for the more essential elements of national strength. The circumstances of the two countries peculiarly suit them for an interchange of benefits—agriculture, or at least the raw material of agriculture, being the predominant field of industry in one, and manufacturing skill in the other; in one capital is abundant, in the other labour. The requisites that appear most essential for securing to both the greatest possible good appear to be, a steady perseverance in the imperial policy that has lately marked the government of Ireland, affording the security of equal and efficiently administered laws to the persons and property of her inhabitants—allaying party and religious animosities—diffusing useful knowledge—encouraging the investment and creation of capital—improving internal communications—providing for her indigent poor—and putting at rest any uncertainty that may exist as to the permanent maintenance of the legislative union between the two kingdoms. Ireland labours only under the disadvantage of youth, in not being so old as England and Scotland in the pursuits of industry, in religious toleration, in social quiet, security, and amalgamation; in the excellence of her magisterial and judicial administration, and in the equity and wisdom of her political rule.

No account can be given of the general trade between Britain and Ireland subsequent to 1825, the commerce between the two countries being in that year assimilated, and, with the exception of grain, no register has been kept of the goods sent to, or received from, Ireland. The following exhibits the value of the merchandise Ireland exported to, and imported from, Britain during the first quarter of a century after the Union.

Estimated tonnage of Ireland in 1825, 510,245 tons; in 1835, 734,068 tons; increase, 223,823 tons. In 1835 Ireland exported agricultural produce to England to the value of 12,080,558., and took back in return English manufactures to the amount of 10,918,459.

The trade with Ireland has increased faster and exceeds on an average of years that carried on with the United States of America. The following is the declared value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported to the United States in each of the following years:—

WAGES, FACTORIES, EMIGRATION, POOR-RATES, SAVINGS' BANKS, LUNATICS, BASTARDS.

It is likely the present reign will be hereafter reverted to as one of the most favourable in British history to the welfare of the industrious orders. Its great and manifold blessings can hardly be exaggerated. While vital reforms were being effected in political and social institutions, the condition of the people was unusually prosperous, and they had a greater command probably than in any former period of equal duration over the comforts and conveniences of living. During the whole seven years of the king's government there was not one failing harvest; all the crops were above an average, with the exception of that of 1831, which was nearly an average, and which very partial deficiency was amply compensated by the unusual abundance of 1835, that reduced the price of wheat to 39s. per quarter. The average price from 1830 to 1837, both inclusive, was only 55s. 3d. a quarter; about the average price of the eight years of peace and prosperity that preceded the war of 1793, and with which the present reign may be aptly compared. Clothing also became extremely cheap, which enabled the working classes not only to clothe themselves more decently and comfortably, but to wear articles of a more durable description than formerly. Calicoes are supposed to have fallen full two-thirds in price since the peace of 1815; linens, one-half; stout shoes, one third; the coarse felt hats, for which labouring men used to pay 3s. 6d., fell to 2s., or have been superseded by silk hats. The reduction in the price of hardware has been enormous. Beer, tea, coffee, candles, and soap have been made more accessible to the community, either by greater abundance or the repeal of duties and removal of obstructions that impeded their sale to the consumer.

While articles of ordinary use fell in price, the rate of wages was kept up. There was no diminution in the means of purchasing. Some occupations certainly suffered, and were superseded, as that of the hand-loom weavers, by mechanical improvements; the fluctuations of fashion, also, wrought partial derangements, but generally there never was a period within the experience of the present generation when employment was more abundant, and when the wages of labour, taken in conjunction with the prices of every article that forms the expenditure of a working man, were so well calculated to ensure his comfort and independence.

Over this gratifying representation it is necessary to introduce some shading to render the social picture correct. The agricultural classes did not participate equally with the manufacturing in the general improvement of condition. In the benefits resulting from the low prices of clothing and food all shared; but this cheapness was accompanied with, and partly helped to produce, a scarcity of employment in the rural districts. The low price of wheat discouraged the application of capital to land, so that the increase of employment therein did not keep pace with the increase in the number of the people. For many years there have been symptoms of a growing redundancy of farm-labourers, manifested in a depression of wages, and consequent general discontent, as evinced by incendiary fires, the destruction of threshing machines, and other prædial outrages.

Another topic essential to a faithful elucidation of the state of the country at the beginning of 1837 requires to be noticed. Although the king's reign may be considered to have been the millennium of the industrious classes, it failed to effect any great amendment in the common diet of the people. Animal food, wheaten bread, and beer, still continued inaccessible to a large portion of the population of the United Kingdom. In Ireland potatoes it is well known are the staple food of the inhabitants. The government commissioners who reported on the state of that country in 1836, stated that agricultural wages varied from 6d. to 1s. a day; that the average in general was about 8d.; and that the earnings of the labourers did not amount, on an average of the whole class, to more than from 2s. to 2s. 6d. a-week for the year round. The number of persons out of work and in distress during 30 weeks of the year was estimated at not less than 585,000, and the number of persons dependent upon them at not less than 1,800,000; making, in the whole, 2,385,000. The commissioners found that, while in Britain the agricultural families constitute little more than a fourth, in Ireland they constitute about two-thirds of the whole population; that there were in 1831 in Britain 1,055,982 agricultural labourers, and in Ireland 1,131,715; while the cultivated land of Britain amounts to about 34,250,000 acres, and that of Ireland only to 14,600,000. There are in Ireland, therefore, about five agricultural labourers for every two there are for the same quantity of land in Britain; and the actual produce of Britain exceeds by four times that of Ireland.

The backwardness and destitution of the Irish are more easily described than the remedies. But the food and domestic conveniences of some parts of Britain do not offer such a remarkable contrast to the condition of the sister kingdom, and we cannot, any more than the continental nations, boast of an entirely wheat-fed population.

In the northern districts of England, in the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland, the farmers work hard and subsist on very humble fare; their ordinary diet consisting of barley-bread, potatoes, milk, and a small quantity of bacon. Their industry and frugal living is very profitable to their landlords, who are thereby enabled to obtain much higher rents than their southern neighbours. Across the border, in Scotland, the condition of the agricultural population is not found to be more advanced. Rents have increased four-fold, but animal food and malt liquor continue out of the reach of the great body of Scottish husbandmen. The well-cultivated farms of East Lothian, Berwick, and Roxburgh, are so many manufactories, in which, the ploughmen, aided by horses and machinery, make plenty of corn and meat, but of which they do not partake. Their diet is oatmeal, mixed in water, or in milk, if they be allowed the use of a cow, and cakes made of barley-meal and pea-meal mixed together. Their lodging is equally mean. They are housed outside the farm-yard in sheds like barracks; each family in damp, dark, single apartments, unless it has been divided with wooden partitions at the occupants' own expense; the walls in many instances not plastered; and, in all, the floor consisting of nothing but the bare ground, and often below the level of the adjoining road, from which the rain-water may be making its way into the interior of the hovel, which is lighted with one or two windows, consisting of four of the smallest panes of the coarsest glass. The windows are mostly built in, so that they cannot be opened for fresh air. There is no ceiling; nothing above but the bare rafters, and the thatched or tiled roof. Houses, or boothies as they are called, of this description, may be seen in all directions within five miles of Edinburgh. Capital has increased enormously, but the peasantry are scarcely better off than their grandfathers; have hardly more comforts or higher wages. The parochial schools are so defective, both in books and mode of education, that few agricultural labourers can either read or write with facility. Their ignorance, general discomfort, and severe toil, prematurely exhaust them, and make them short-lived.

It is in dress and outward appearance that the greatest improvements have been effected. The cheapness of manufactures enables a Scotch dairy-maid to clothe herself in a complete summer Sunday's dress for 20s. Her winter garb will cost a little more, from 25s. to 28s., and both suits, with care, will last considerably more than a twelvemonth. Making included, a ploughman may clothe himself decently on Sundays for less than 2*l.* 10s.; his working garb (mole-skin) costs about 15s., and, if to these be added a ploughing-coat and stout shoes, 10s. each, his whole bill to the draper and tailor will not exceed 4*l.* 6s.

In the principal towns of Scotland and England the different ranks of society on Sundays can hardly be distinguished by difference of attire. They all dress well, and little difference exists in the quality and shape of their costume. Men wear silk or beaver hats; coats of woollen cloth; waistcoats of cloth, silk, or velvet; shirts of calico or linen; hose of cotton, silk, or worsted; trousers of kerseymeré, or other material, with silk or cotton stocks, shoes or boots, which form the general walking garb of all classes. There is a like approximation to uniformity in female costume. Stuffs, merinos, French cloth, muslins, silks, and satins, are generally worn, according to the season of the year. It was thought a great luxury in queen Elizabeth to wear silk hose, but, in king William's reign, maid-servants were frequently seen in silk dresses, with laced caps, and silk, velvet, Dunstable, or Tuscan bonnets.

The low price of books may be noticed among the beneficial changes affecting the masses of the nation. This has been partly caused by the practice of stereotyping and the application of steam in press-work; the reduction in the price of paper and the cost of embellishments; and by publishers trusting more to an extensive sale than to high profits for a remunerative return. On this principle many useful compilations have been put forth; some of the standard works reprinted, and numerous cheap periodical publications established, that have contributed, aided by popular lectures of literary and scientific societies, very extensively to the intellectual improvement of the people.

The state most desirable to attain by the industrious orders is exemption from sudden vicissitudes. During the last thirty years the price of labour has been nearly stationary, both in skilled and unskilled occupations. The wages of labourers in husbandry, and of carpenters, bricklayers, masons, tailors, spinners, and plumbers in towns, were nearly the same in 1805 as in 1835. The alternations of misery and comfort they have experienced have been mainly produced by circumstances over which they had no control; namely, changes in the value of paper-money, fluctuations in the amount of employment from mercantile speculation, and sudden vicissitudes in the price of bread, either from the seasons or the artificial operation of the corn-laws. Parliament has applied a remedy to the currency, and the other sources of popular derangement are not less deserving of legislative attention. That in which the working classes have wrought the most detriment to themselves has been in the indefensible claims of the trade-unions; they drove the masters into counter combinations in their own defence, and the result of the struggle, as might have been predicted, was the discomfiture of the workmen, the dissolution of their societies, and reduction, in some instances, of the rate of wages.

The employment of children in Mills and Factories formed an anxious subject of inquiry in the present reign. During the last sixty years the domestic manufacture of the West of England, Lancashire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire, has been gradually yielding to the encroachments of capital and machinery. Manual labour could not contend, in many stages of manufacture, either in cheapness or execution, with these powerful competitors; the factories combining, on a great scale, all the resources of money and mechanical ingenuity. In 1835 the number of persons, of all ages, employed in the cotton, wool, silk, and flax factories, worked by steam and water, in England, was 298,033; in Wales, 1936; Scotland, 50,180; Ireland, 9564: making a total population in the United Kingdom of 365,373. Of this number, 158,555 were males and 196,818 females. Between the ages of 8 and 12, the number employed of both sexes was 20,588; between 13 and 18, 108,208; above 18 years old, 190,710. The employment of a greater number of females than males, and of so many children of a tender age, constitutes the most objectionable peculiarity of factory industry. Parliament has sought to protect the unfortunate juveniles, by prohibiting the employment of children under a certain age and limiting the hours of labour; and its efforts to improve their condition have not been wholly fruitless, as the writer had an opportunity of witnessing during a late tour in the manufacturing districts. Legislative interference, however, can only be looked upon as a temporary palliative; the most effective cure must be sought in the higher moral tone and intellectual culture of the male operatives, who ought to be the natural protectors of their wives and offspring.

A few statements are subjoined, elucidatory of the subjects of the present section. Great light has been thrown on the condition of the body of the people by the inquiries of parliamentary committees, and by the commissions on the poor-laws, factories, and the state of Ireland, and the results of whose labours are in course of being arranged and published by Mr. Porter in his "Progress of the Nation."

These are the contract rates of wages paid to the masters, and exceed the sums received by the workmen. Wages are higher in London than at Manchester, Glasgow, or Londonderry, by 16 or 20 per cent.; a difference partly made up by the less price of provisions, fuel, and house-rent. The rise of wages subsequent to 1800 was doubtless occasioned by the bad seasons of the four preceding years. Wheat rose to 139s. per quarter in 1801; its quality was injured by excessive rains; and every other article of provision was proportionately dear and unwholesome. The severe privations of the people checked the growth of population; and the number of marriages, which in 1798 amounted to 79,477, fell in 1800 to 69,851, and in 1801 to 67,288.

Wages in husbandry were affected in a like manner by the dearth at the close of the last century. It appears, from Mr. Barton's statements, and other sources, that the average weekly wages of farm-labourers, in England, in money and in equivalent punts of wheat, at the yearly average price, were as follows:—

persons employed in manufactures and other branches of industry during the present reign.

COTTON MANUFACTURE.—It is calculated (McCulloch's Com. Dict. 415) that 833,000 persons are directly employed in this manufacture as spinners, weavers, bleachers, &c. and that their aggregate wages amount to 20,000,000*l.* per annum. About one-fifth of the people employed are men, one-third women, and the remainder children. The following is a statement of the number and average wages of the work-people in the employ of Messrs. Birley, Horaby, and Kirk, made out in January, 1832.

	Spinners.	Weavers.	No.
	s. d.	s. d.
Men . . .	20 6	15 1½	379
Women . .	11 3½	9 7½	563
Children .	5 10	5 4½	654

The change from hand to power-loom weaving has caused extreme distress in Lancashire. According to the inquiries of parliament, the hand-loom weavers comprise a body of 840,000 individuals; rather exceeding the amount of the African slave population, concerning whose freedom so long and laudable an interest has been manifested in the nation. In 1800 their wages averaged 18*s.* to 20*s.*; in 1846 they had fallen to 12*s.* or 14*s.* weekly, and in 1835, to 3*s.* or 7*s.* At Manchester they were from 5*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.* net; Aberdeen, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* net; Bolton, 4*s.* 1½*d.* net; Dundee, 6*s.* to 7*s.* net; Forfar, 6*s.* net; Glasgow, 4*s.* to 8*s.* gross; Huddersfield, 4*s.* to 5*s.*, a few 16; Lanark, 5*s.* 1*d.* net; Paisley 6*s.* to 7*s.* gross; Perth, 4*s.* 9*d.* to 7*s.* 9*d.* net; Preston, 4*s.* 9*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* gross; Spitalfields, 7*s.* 6*d.* to 8*s.* gross; Stockport, 9*s.* gross; Coventry, 7*s.* 6*d.* net; Nuneaton, 4*s.* 8*d.* net; Drogheda, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 4*s.* net; Belfast, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* gross.

The average earnings of 657 weavers of different classes at Leeds were found by Mr. Baines to be, for the first class, men, 11*s.* 3*d.*; women, 5*s.* 9*d.*; boys, 7*s.* 3*d.*; girls, 5*s.* 9*d.*; but that these have employment during ten months in the year only. For the second class, men, 8*s.* 6*d.*; women, 5*s.*; boys, 5*s.*; but that these are employed during six months of the year only.

It is only recently that the silk manufacture has been firmly established in this country. Since the year 1824, when the restrictions on the trade were removed, the silk manufacture has spread into various districts, and is now conducted on such improved principles, as not only to place the products of the silk-loom within the reach of the humbler classes, but also to enable the manufacturer successfully to compete in the foreign market. The number of silk-mills in Manchester, which in 1820 was only five, had increased in 1832 to sixteen. The total number of silk-factories in England in 1835 was 231, employing 29,947 persons, of which number 19,946 were females.

The number of persons employed in the woollen manufacture in England and Wales are supposed to be about 400,000, and their aggregate wages to amount to 9,600,000*l.*

The wages of spinners, slubbers, and dressers average about 21*s.* weekly. Forty years since the average wages of men, women, and children, in this manufacture, were from 5*s.* to 6*s.* each per week; they are now from 9*s.* to 10*s.* each per week. In the former period, masons, carpenters, &c., had 1*s.* 3*d.* and 1*s.* 6*d.* a-day; they have now 3*s.*, 3*s.* 6*d.*, and 4*s.* a-day.

The carpet manufacturers of Kidderminster in 1830 were divided into three classes:

- 1st class earning 30*s.* per week;
- 2d class about 23*s.* per week;
- 3d class 20*s.* per week.

The workpeople in the hardware and metal manufactures carried on in Sheffield may also be divided into best, second, and third-rate workmen, earning rates of wages varying as follows:

- The best class about 25*s.* per week.
- The second class . . . 20*s.* , ,
- The third class . . . 16*s.* , ,

For one of the highest class there are three of the second and eight of the third. All these persons generally work by the piece. They comprise full 16,000 persons in the town of Sheffield alone. But the total number of persons in Britain directly engaged in the different branches of the hardware manufacture, in iron, brass, steel, and copper, is estimated by Mr. McCulloch to amount to 360,000, and the aggregate value of their products in different metals in a year to 17,500,000*l.*

The rate of wages in London has undergone no material alteration for the last quarter of a century. Those of journeymen tailors have been long maintained at 6*s.* a-day, and this continues the general rate notwithstanding their unfortunate rupture with the masters in 1834. The wages of printers have been equally steady. In 1800 a compositor in book-work received 33*s.* weekly; on a morning newspaper, 40*s.*; evening, 37*s.* In 1811 there was an advance in these rates; since which, they have remained respectively at 36*s.*, 48*s.*, and 43*s.* 6*d.* per week.

The price of labour is less subject to fluctuation than that of any other commodity. The pay of seamen has undergone little permanent variation since the peace; fluctuating, in the Baltic and American trade, between 55*s.* and 60*s.* a-month. In the Newcastle coal-trade there has been greater unfixedness, but in this occupation wages appear to have settled at the long-established rate of from 65s. to 70s. per voyage to London.

All under ten years are employed on silk only; children between ten and twelve years are subject to the education clauses of the bill for regulating labour in factories, except those in silk, and work nine hours per day, or forty-eight hours per week. On March 1, 1836, this regulation was extended to children under thirteen years. Young persons between twelve and eighteen years work twelve hours a-day, or sixty-nine per week. In 1836 the regulations were altered, so as to include only those from thirteen to eighteen years of age. A new act for the regulation of factories has been brought forward, and is now (1839) under the consideration of parliament.

EMIGRATION.—In the Chronicle will have been observed notices of attempts to form new settlements in South Africa and Australia, and of extensive emigrations to North America. The subject attracted much attention in 1827, and a parliamentary committee reported that there was a permanent redundancy of able-bodied labourers, especially in the agricultural districts. Government, however, refrained from countenancing any general plan of colonization, lest its motives might be misrepresented, as indicative of a design to “get rid of the people:” with the exception of the encouragement it has afforded to the removal of part of the Chelsea pensioners to Canada, and the incorporating the Australian Company, it has limited its co-operation to the grant by sale of a local title to foreign territories. Under this system of non-interference, it will appear, from the following statement of the number of emigrants from the United Kingdom to America, the Cape of Good Hope, and Australia, that emigration has made no great progress:—

POOR RATES.—As this is the first statement that has been given of the progress of the poor-rates, it has been carried back to an early period. The introduction of the new poor law in 1834, effected a material reduction in the amount of the assessment. Its other results, as before observed (p. 863), will require a longer term of experience than the present reign has afforded to appreciate. Abundance of employment for the people, and the unusual low price of bread and provisions up to the harvest of 1838, have been peculiarly favourable to the new legislative experiment.

The enormous reduction in parochial expenditure has been chiefly effected by the refusal of out-door relief to the poor, and the consolidation of parishes into unions, under local boards of guardians, chosen by the higher class of rate-payers, and superintended by a central board of commissioners sitting in London. The new system has been rapidly and energetically carried out. During the first year of the commission the number of parishes formed into unions was 2069; in the second year, 5846, and in the third year the number was 5598. In July 1837, 12,132 parishes in England had been united, containing a population of 10,556,907, and 1301 parishes, many of them under local acts, had not been united. The greatest resistance to the new law has been encountered in the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire and Lancashire, where the separation of the sexes, non-relief, and removal of the poor by emigration, have been stoutly resisted on Scriptural grounds. Pending the temporary commercial difficulties of 1837, the commissioners were compelled to relax their cardinal rule of refusing relief except in a workhouse, in the counties of Leicester and Nottingham, and they have commenced allowing greater discretion to the boards of guardians in carrying out the act. Lord John Russell stated (House of Commons, March 14, 1839) that the value of some land had increased under the operation of the act by three years' purchase, but the intrinsic worth and permanence of this gain it will require a longer and more varied term of experience than the last five years to determine.

Savings Banks.—The number of Savings Banks in 1837 was, in England, 298; Scotland 9; Wales 23; Ireland 78; making a total of 408. The total number of depositors in the United Kingdom was 624,60; the amount of investments, 18,455,044*l.*, making the average amount invested by each depositor 30*l.* The total number of depositors for sums not exceeding 20*l.* was 334,489. The number of depositors not exceeding 20*l.* in 1830 was 215,010; in 1831 they increased 7954; in 1832, 4147; in 1833, 17,415; in 1834, 16,769; in 1835, 20,278; in 1836, 27,644; in 1837, 25,272.

Bastardy.—The total number of bastards chargeable to parishes in England in the year 1835 was 65,475; in 1837 the number chargeable had been reduced to 39,371; being a decrease of 40 per cent. in two years. The number of bastards affiliated in 1835 was 11,244; in 1837, under the new poor law only 3862. It would be erroneous to infer that the number of natural children born had diminished in an equal ratio with the number of affiliations. Under the new law the burden of maintenance is thrown entirely on the mother, or relief granted only on such proofs and onerous terms as often prevent paternal affiliations. The tendency of such a coercive procedure requires to be gravely considered and vigilantly watched. It is not intended to underrate either the necessity or importance of some of the provisions of the poor law act, but it is obvious that a reduction in the poor assessment and in the apparent amount of bastardy afford only equivocal proofs of the successful working of the new legislation: which may, unperceived, be slowly generating internal maladies much more dangerous to the state than the former external exhibitions of improvidence and incontinence. M. Guerry, in his valuable work on the Statistics of Crime in France, records a discovery that pointedly bears on the latter subject. He says, "The departments in which there are the greatest number of illegitimate births are in general those where the fewest number of infanticides are committed. And that, on the other hand, where infanticides are most numerous, there frequently are the fewest number of illegitimate births."

Lunatics and Idiots.—The total number of pauper lunatics and idiots in England and Wales is 13,667. Male lunatics 2814, females 3568. Male idiots 3372, females 3891. In England there is one lunatic or idiot to 1033 of the population, and in Wales 1 to 807. The proportion of idiots is largest in the agricultural counties, and of lunatics in the manufacturing districts.

Consumption of Malt.—The number of bushels of malt consumed in the United Kingdom is the last statistical fact we shall adduce to elucidate the condition and progress of the working classes. The subjoined comparative return of the bushels of malt consumed in 1830 and 1837 confirms our general description of the flourishing state of the population during the present reign:—

The bills of mortality for 1837 are said to be more imperfect than usual. By the operation of the New Registration Act a difficulty has been experienced in obtaining returns of christenings and burials in some parishes; in others, where the office of searcher (persons employed in London to examine the dead persons to interment) has been discontinued, the diseases of which deaths have taken place have been necessarily omitted. But it seldom happens all the parishes within the bills make returns. The following are the numbers and ages of those who died in 1832, (year of the cholera morbus) 1836, and 1837:—

The still-born, which, in 1837, amounted to 845, are not included in the bills.

The above may be compared with the returns at p. 850, and those given p. 404, and the earlier years of the reign of George I.

Before vaccination was established, the mortality from small-pox in the metropolis exceeded 5000 annually, although the population was one-fourth less. The deaths from this fatal disease, prior to 1837, were about 300 annually. But in November of that year small-pox began to spread epidemically in London, and so widely, that from that month until November, 1838, the admissions into the Small-pox Hospital amounted to 700—the largest number ever received since the foundation of the hospital. The disease has also been prevalent in the country; chiefly, from the erroneous impression abroad that the vaccine matter has lost its preventive efficacy by time, and people consequently again resorting to inoculation.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, REPORTING, POPULAR LITERATURE.

The glory of newspapers, magazines, and parliamentary reporting, belongs to the last and present centuries. There were earlier attempts at journalism, but they were only attempts, and can no more be likened to the modern broad-sheet than an Indian canoe to an Atlantic steamer. During the commonwealth there were wing-footed Mercuries, speeding their flight from London to York in the brief space of a fortnight or three weeks, freighted with tidings of equal importance, and recording with not less scrupulous etiquette than the present court circular, the daily proceedings, the entrances and exits from about Whitehall, of "His highness, the lord protector," of the "most illustrious lady, the lady Mary Cromwell," and of "the most noble lord, the lord Falconbridge." These, however, were like angels' visits, few and far between; they were not periodicals, but bulletins, or political pamphlets issued at uncertain intervals. In 1663, when Roger L'Estrange set up with privilege his Intelligencer, he boasted that "one book a-week may be expected to be published every Thursday, and finished upon the Tuesday night, leaving Wednesday entire for printing off." So much time spent in "finishing" and "printing off" of perhaps a circulation not exceeding 100 copies would make the intelligence conveyed by Roger to his London customers not very fresh, and by the time it reached the country reader would be dead matter of history. The Intelligencer preceded the London Gazette about two years, and a copy of it may be seen in the British Museum, consisting of four pages, about the size of a Penny Magazine or Chambers' Journal.

Before the revolution of 1688 there were several London papers, regulated by licences and surveyors of the press. In 1709 London had one daily paper, fifteen three times a-week, and once twice a week: this was the year before the imposition of a penny stamp-duty, when a kind of mania raged for the latest arrivals, and when it was a subject of complaint in the aristocratic British Mercury, that in the metropolis "The meanest of shopkeepers and handicrafts spend whole days in coffee-houses ['penny universities,' as they are disparagingly called] to hear news and talk politics, whilst their wives and children want bread at home." After the statute of 1724, providing for the better collection of the stamp-duty, there were three daily papers, six weekly, and ten twice a-week. It seems to have dealt a heavy blow to genius, for Swift, in his "Journal to Stella," speaking of the effect of the new regulations, says, "Do you know that Grub-street is dead and gone last week? No more ghosts or murders now for love or money." The dean, however, was premature; the penny-aliners still live, and are occasionally allowed to ply their vocation in the dark November months of the parliamentary interregnum, even in the London journals.

About the period of the introduction of the stamp-duty, the Leeds Mercury and some other of the old country papers had been established. They mostly present a singular contrast to their successors in their diminutive size, the meagreness of their contents, and are for the most part printed in larger type,—more suited, perhaps, to the bad eyes or bad lights of their readers.

The desire of news from the capital on the part of the wealthier country residents, and probably the false informy of William impertinence of the public-dham, and sir the common establishment last, after various trade, that of a news of the lords, who who, for a subscription; some printers for pounds per annum, protests, asked, with every post-day to be to be less jealous of country. This profane the other house, in the reign of the consequence," con-Jonson's play, "naut member, "if you is to go on unchecked?

written in the first year of Charles I., there is an amusing description of an office of copyists and news-manufacturers:—

"This is the outer room where my clerks sit, And keep their sides, the Register I the midst: The Examiner, he sits private there, within: And here I have my several rolls and files Of news by the alphabet, and all put up Under their heads."

As this was long before the age of expresses, of resident agents abroad, of rival reporters, vying like race-horses in speed on well-macadamized roads—composing the while for next day's paper, in flying post-chaises and four, the disjecta membra of a Glasgow or Edinburgh Festival—the news-correspondent often suffered under a grievous dearth of interesting events and occurrences, that drove him to shifts and contrivances—to deal largely in on dits—to satisfy the ever-craving appetite of the rural quid nuno—the consequence of which was, that his manuscript circular fell into as much disrepute as the public news.

In the advertisement, announcing the first number of the Evening Post, (September 6, 1709,) it is said, "There must be three or four pound per annum paid by those gentlemen who are out of town for written news, which is so far, generally, from having any probability of matter of fact in it, that it is frequently stuffed up with a We hear, &c., or An eminent Jew merchant has received a letter, &c.; being nothing more than downright fiction." The same advertisement, speaking of the published papers, says, "We read more of our own affairs in the Dutch papers than in any of our own." The trade of a news-correspondent seems to have suggested a sort of union of written news and printed news; for, towards the end of the seventeenth century, we have news-letters printed in type to imitate writing. The most celebrated of these was that commenced by Ichabod Dawks in 1696, the first number of which was thus announced: "This letter will be done upon good writing-paper, and blank space left, that any gentleman may write his own private business. It does undoubtedly exceed the best of the written news, contains double the quantity, is read with abundant more ease and pleasure, and will be useful to improve the younger sort in writing a curious hand." Dawks arrived at such a

In the reign of the first Stuart came an inundation of pedantry, which surrounded the court with verbal criticism and solemn quibble;—the people, indeed, had their glorious dramatists, but Bacon was looked upon as an impracticable dreamer. Controversy, too, began to be rife, and the spirit at last exploded in such a torrent of civil and ecclesiastical violence in the next reign, as left no opening for science or belles lettres. The press was absorbed by the productions of this contentious outbreak. There is in the British Museum a collection of 2000 volumes of tracts issued between the years 1640 and 1660, the whole number of which several publications amounts to the enormous quantity of 30,000. This most curious collection was made by a bookseller of the name of Tomlinson, in the times when the tracts were printed—was bargained for, but not bought, by Charles II.—and was eventually bought by George III., and presented by him to the British Museum. The limited demand for any publications unconnected with controversial subjects may be inferred from the little popularity enjoyed by Milton's metrical productions, and the fact mentioned by Dr. Johnson, that from 1623 to 1664, the nation was satisfied with two editions of Shakspeare's plays, which probably together did not amount to 1000 copies. The cause of wholesome literature did not benefit by the Restoration,—it was a transition from one extreme to another—from a conclave to a brothel,—and it became a mere toy of a licentious king, his courtesans and gallants, who sought to divert their weariness with wits and authors, as monarchs were wont to do with their jesters. Charles II. and his followers brought hither the spirit of the literary parasites of Louis XIV., with whom the great were everything and the people nothing, save a brute and random bolt, or slumbering shell in a mortar. Under this kind of favour, letters, with a few grand exceptions, put on the lowest garb in which they can be arrayed—were tricked out in meretricious finery—habiliments to excite the gross passions of human nature—to pander to the low appetites of the swell mob of St. James's, or the hardly less degraded rabble that congregated nightly at Blackfriars, or the Globe theatre in Southwark.

Literature, to be enduring and generally useful, must be based on the popular demand. If supported only by courtiers, nobles, or ecclesiastics, it is not national, but the literature of a class, and partakes of the vices of class interests. This distinction English letters attained under Queen Anne, when the caprice of private patronage, which had been fed by soft and mendacious dedications, was exchanged for the more steady, remunerative, and independent support of the people. The penny "Tallies," "Spectators," and "Guardians," were less exciting, and more conducive to a healthy state of the public intellect, than meagre paragraphs about the Low Countries, Prince Eugene, the Turks, and the Austrians, rumours of wars, and domestic scandal. They formed the taste, sentiment, and manners of society; they were to the middle ranks of those days what the cheap weekly periodicals now are to the working classes. They were not remarkable for originality, they were commonplace, and their triteness made them more suited to their purpose. Executed with singular good intent, fancy, delicacy, and judgment, they were better adapted to the first stages of popular training, by creating a literary propensity and seducing the reader's affections, than startling philosophical appeals to his understanding.

The Essayists had also the merit of being the harbingers of a higher class of periodical miscellany—the MAGAZINE. A printer, Edward Cave by name, with a shrewd regard to creating regular employment for his presses, formed the design of establishing a miscellany to collect into a permanent repository the most valuable of the fugitive pieces from the newspapers and other sheets, or rather half-sheets, that had appeared during the month. Of these it is stated, that "besides divers written accounts, no less than 200 per month were then thrown from the press only in London, and about as many printed elsewhere in the three kingdoms." He offered a share of his undertaking to half the booksellers in London, who rejected the project as absurd or injurious to their interests. These gentlemen had not learnt, even by the success of the Essayists, to rely upon the talisman of low prices in creating a demand. In 1731, Cave at his own risk produced the first magazine printed in England—The Gentleman's. Its success was so great, that in the following year the booksellers became jealous; they could not understand Cave's scheme till they had discovered its value by their own peculiar mode of testing the merit of literary enterprise, and they then set up a rival magazine, "The London." In 1749 the first review, "The Monthly," was started, and in a few years was followed by "The Critical." They did an immense deal for literature and the literary character. They did not create poets and philosophers, but they prevented kings, and lords, and fashionables, pretending to create them.

"Un Auguste peut aisément faire un Virgile" was the sweet lollypop addressed by Boileau or other pensioned sycophant to the illiterate and vain-glorious Louis XIV.

Connected with the rise of the magazine, and about four years after, may be dated the commencement of PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING. Prior to this time the current proceedings of the house of commons were no more known to their constituents, than the proceedings of a cabinet council now are. Although accounts of single speeches, and even of entire debates, had been occasionally printed from a much earlier period, the only regular record of parliamentary proceedings which was given to the public, up to within about a century of the present time, was that contained in the "Historical Register," and the "Political State of Europe," both of which were annual publications. Parliament sternly asserted its right to prohibit all promulgation of its doings through the press, at least while it was sitting; and many persons maintained that it had the power to prevent any publication of its debates even during the recess. The first attempt at a monthly publication of the debates was made in an extraordinary number of the Gentleman's Magazine for August, 1735, which contained a report of the debate in the lords on the 23d of January preceding. The practice was continued in succeeding numbers. It was, however, no publication of the debates during the sitting of the houses; the session was always over before anything done in the course of it was given in the magazine. Even while following at this distance, the reports were of the most timid and cautious description. The names of the speakers were given only by the first and last letters, and in many cases no speaker's name is mentioned; all that appears is a summary of the argument and discussion. They got bolder by degrees, and at last the names were printed at full length. This audacity, coupled with the fact that some of the members appeared in a light not very satisfactory to themselves, either from their own defects, or the incorrect version of their oratory, caused the attention of the commons to be drawn to the subject. It was brought under notice, April 13, 1738, by the speaker, who was followed by sir William Yonge, sir William Windham, and sir Thomas Winnington. The last, after referring to the conduct of the lords, who had lately punished some printers for publishing their protests, asked, with warmth, if they were to be less jealous of their privileges than the other house? "What will be the consequence?" continued the indignant member, "if you allow these reports to go on unchecked?"

Why, sir, you will have every word that is spoken here by gentlemen misrepresented by fellows who thrust themselves into our gallery. You will have the speeches of this house every day printed, even during your session; and we shall be looked upon as the most contemptible assembly on the face of the earth!"

Mr. Pulteney and sir Robert Walpole, the leaders of the two political parties, followed, without dissenting from the last speaker's disparaging prognostication; after which, a thundering resolution was unanimously agreed to, declaring it "a high indignity to, and a notorious breach of, the privileges of the house to publish the debates, either while parliament is sitting or during the recess," and threatening to proceed against offenders with the "utmost severity." As an account of parliamentary business was now obtained with greater risk, the report of the debates necessarily became more inaccurate than before, and various contrivances were employed to disguise a version of them. The Gentleman's Magazine published them under the title of "The Debates in the Senate of Lilliput," and the London Magazine under that of a "Journal of the Proceedings and Debates in the Political Club;" giving Roman names to the speakers, while each publication printed an explanatory key to the whole at the end of the year. The two gentlemen principally occupied in this mystification were Mr. William Guthrie, the author of a continuation of Smollett's History of England, and Mr. Thomas Gordon, a translator of Tacitus, both of whom were Scotchmen.

About this time the celebrated Samuel Johnson arrived in London, poverty-stricken and without a lodging, accompanied by his hardly less celebrated townsman, David Garrick. He had for some years furnished essays and biographies to Cave's Magazine, who engaged him in the composition of the parliamentary debates. The reports from Nov. 19, 1740, to Feb. 23, 1743, inclusive, are considered to have been entirely prepared by him. The plan first adopted seems to have been, for Guthrie, who had a good memory, to bring home as much as he could recollect of the debate from the house, mending his draft by whatever other assistance he could command; after which, the matter thus collected underwent the finishing touches of Johnson. At times, according to Boswell, Johnson had no other aid than the names of the speakers, and the side they took, being left to his own resources to find the argument and language. A speech—the celebrated speech he put into the mouth of Mr.

Pitt, March 10, 1741, when that distinguished orator replied to the taunts of Horace Walpole on account of his youth.—Johnson afterwards declared, in the company of Francis, Wedderburn, Foote, and Murphy, that he "wrote it in a garret in Exeter-street." His reports, however, are considered by the editor of Hansard's Parliamentary History the most authentic extant, faithfully embodying the argument, if not the style, of the speakers. It was once observed to him, that he dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties. "That is not quite true," said Johnson: "I saved appearances tolerably well, but I took care that the whig dogs should not have the best of it." The reports increased immensely the sale of the magazine; they enabled Cave to set up an equipage, who had the good sense, instead of going to the heralds' office for a crest, to clap on the door-pannel a representation of his office at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell; where Johnson sometimes ate his dinner, concealed behind a screen, not having suitable clothes to appear in before the more modish visitors of his employer, some of them perhaps M.P.'s, who dropped in to see or correct the maiden proofs of their oratory in the senate.

All this time the debates had not descended to the Newspapers; nor did they till thirty years later. The Gazetteer and other daily prints, consisting of a folio half-sheet or single leaf, were usually taken up with a political essay, some scraps of foreign news many months old, a few notices of domestic occurrences from the country, and a parcel of advertisements, mostly of quack medicines, low jest-books, and other matters suited to vulgar taste. The proceedings of parliament were rarely noticed at all, except perhaps to the extent of an intimation that, his majesty, it was reported, intended to go down to the house, to deliver a gracious speech. Things continued nearly in this state till 1770, when, though the papers had doubled in size, they still contained no debates. Soon after this, however, a great change took place. The conduct of the house of commons in the case of the Middlesex election of the preceding year, when they declared colonel Luttrell to be the sitting member instead of Mr. Wilkes, who had been returned by an immense majority of votes, had drawn upon the proceedings of parliament a degree of popular attention which they had never received since the Revolution; and had excited a determined spirit of resistance to what appeared the arbitrary conduct of the commons. The legality of its assumed privileges was jealously scrutinized, and the right of the house to interdict the publication of its proceedings was the ground on which it was determined to make a stand. The printers of newspapers had long intended (Woodfall's Junius, iii. 345) to report the debates, and now resolved to make the experiment. They knew that they could confidently count upon being supported in the contest they were about to commence by nearly the whole force of public opinion, and towards the end of 1770 several of the London papers began to carry their determination of reporting into effect. The example was immediately followed by the Dublin Mercury, and the whole of the country papers.

It was not long before these bold proceedings attracted the notice of the house of commons, and the debates which ensued on several nights were unusually violent. On one evening, March 12, there were twenty-three divisions, and the house did not adjourn till four in the morning. The result was that eight printers were ordered to attend at the bar. But not one of them obeyed the summons. The officers of the house were then ordered to take them into custody, which they did in the case of three, and brought them before the city magistrates, who not only discharged the prisoners, but bound them over to prosecute the officers for false imprisonment. For this two of the magistrates were sent to the Tower; and the clerk of the city, being brought forward to the table of the house, was compelled to tear out the leaves of his register on which the judgments of the magistracy had been recorded. But here the violence of the commons appears to have exhausted itself. None of the refractory printers had yet been brought to the bar, and the house, either from the difficulty of determining on ulterior measures, or apprehensive of consequences, gave up (see Feb. 1771) the struggle. The public excitement was great; immense multitudes assembled nightly around the house, and the populace could hardly be restrained from acts of violence. The victory was complete, and no attempt has since been made to restrain the papers from daily reporting, during the session, the debates of parliament. For some years after, the practice of shutting the gallery of the commons was resorted to; this was frequently done, and the public sometimes excluded for a whole session, especially during the American war.

It is hardly possible to overrate the importance of the right to publish the debates, or its salutary influence, both on the people and their representatives. Parliamentary discussions are a treasury of information on all the chief questions of public interest; and no doubt the practice of daily reporting them was a principal cause of the remarkable display of oratory that almost immediately after distinguished the British senate. Publicity is a cheap and efficient guarantee against the abuse of delegated authority; and the example of England, of open proceedings, has been followed by all the constitutional governments of the continent.

The system of newspaper reporting has been greatly improved since its first introduction. The person by whom it was carried to the greatest perfection, with the old machinery, was Mr. George Woodfall, the proprietor and editor, first of the Public Advertiser, and afterwards of the Morning Chronicle. Mr. Woodfall had so retentive a memory, that it is said he used frequently to write out the account of a whole evening's debate after having merely heard it in the gallery, and without having taken any notes. It would, however, be a mistake to suppose that the speeches thus carried away were given with anything like the fulness and accuracy of modern reports.* Another inconvenience attending the employment of only one reporter for the night was the delay which it occasioned in the publication of the paper. At the time when this practice prevailed it was no uncommon thing for the Morning Chronicle not to make its appearance before nine or ten o'clock at night. The public is indebted to the late Mr. Perry for the first suggestion and introduction of the greatly-improved principle on which parliamentary reporting is now conducted. It was about the year 1783 that that gentleman, on becoming the editor of the Gazetteer, proposed the establishment of a body of reporters to attend every night in succession in both houses. The superior excellence of the reports thus obtained soon superseded the former practice. Each of the great morning papers now employs from eight to twelve reporters, each of whom remains in either house only about three-quarters of an hour, or an hour, when his place is taken by another, and he hastens back to the office to write out the portion of the debate he has brought away with him, for the printer. A long speech may thus be said to extend from the mouth of the speaker to Printing-house-square; he, at the same time, in course of delivery in parliament—part of it travelling along the Strand—part in the hands of the compositor—part printed, and on the desk of the editor, who is occupied in compressing its substance into a leading article or in a commentary to accompany it in next day's publication. No reporter now thinks of depending merely upon his memory; all take notes, though few write short hand, more or less extended. The object aimed at, is not a literal report, but a faithful abridgment of the sentiment, matter, and style of the speaker. The chief speeches are given with extraordinary correctness; but of the inferior speeches, or those of speakers little known to the public, only the points are indicated, and many are passed by in silence. There is only one publication, the Mirror of Parliament, that professes to give all the speeches fully and accurately. Of its accuracy, as a verbatim report, it is not easy to judge. Some of the great morning papers have accused the Mirror, not of misrepresenting what is said in the house, but of permitting the members to misrepresent it. The practice of submitting a speech to the correction of the person that has pronounced it is indeed liable to the objection, that the member will correct the report according to his discretion more than his memory; and the result will be a transcript of what he should have said, or intended to say, rather than of what he really uttered.

Although the duties of reporters are both important and arduous, it is only of late years that a disposition has been shown to afford them facilities for the discharge of them. Formerly they had no means of entering the gallery of the commons beyond those enjoyed by the public generally; and, on days when an interesting debate was expected, they were frequently obliged to take their places on the stairs early in the forenoon, and, after standing there for many hours, to depend for their chance of getting in by battling their way in the crowd when the door opened. The first arrangements for the express purpose of accommodating the reporters were made a few years before the death of Mr. Pitt. Previous to that time note-books had been very generally introduced; but in the commons, from the crowded state of the gallery, they were comparatively of small use. It happened one night, when the premier was to make a lead-speech, that the gallery was more than usually thronged, and neither by force nor entreaty could the reporters procure even tolerable accommodation. They took counsel together, and the result was a secession. Next morning, instead of the rounded periods of the minister, there appeared nothing but one dire blank, accompanied by a strong comment on the grievance in which it had originated. The almost immediate result was the appropriation, under the direction of Mr. speaker Abbott, of the uppermost bench of the gallery to the reporters' exclusive use, with a door in the centre, by which they alone had a right to enter. Soon after, a small room at the end of the gallery passage, which bore off its glass panes the words "Reporters' Room," notwithstanding the standing order and its penalties, was added for the convenience of the gentlemen previous to taking their places in the gallery, and during the divisions. The lords followed the commons in their accommodation of the press, at the due distance which befitted their dignity. It was not until about twenty years ago that a note-book was permitted to make its appearance at the bar of the upper house. If a young or forward reporter ventured to display the implements of his trade to the eyes of their lordships, they were immediately struck from his hand by one or other of the messengers. The first person who ventured to rest his book on their lordships' bar is said to have been Mr. Windyer, who now is, or lately was, a justice of the peace in Sydney, New South Wales. His example was followed; and only two sessions after, the robe of lord Eldon, while his lordship was proceeding to the bar to receive a deputation of the lower house, having accidentally caused Mr. Windyer to drop his book within the bar, the noble earl checked his onward step, picked up the fragments of the passing debate, and presented them, with an engaging smile, to their collector. In the session of 1828-9, when from the intense interest to which the catholic question gave rise, the press found it difficult to maintain their station, a portion of the space below the bar was railed off for them; and a session or two after, when a strangers' gallery was added to the lords, a seat was set apart for their use. In the present temporary erection, the privilege of an exclusive place for the press is provided in both houses—in the commons, behind the speaker's chair.

A regular and authentic publication of the debates must have added immensely to the interest of newspapers, and thereby vastly increased their number and circulation. In 1782 the number of newspapers published in the United Kingdom was 79; in 1790, 146; in 1821, 278; in 1836, 397. In September, 1836, the act for the reduction of the duty came into operation (see p. 1009) and gave a powerful impulse to the newspaper press. Within a year after the number of papers increased from 397 to 458, and their circulation from 35,576,056 to 53,496,207. The following is the parliamentary return, showing the effect of the reduction on the revenue, and the number and circulation of the newspapers in the year before and the year after it took place:—

Year ending Sept. 15, 1836.

The period from the accession of George III. to the close of the last reign has been marked by the rapid increase of the demand for popular literature, rather than by any prominent features of originality in literary production. Periodical literature spread on every side; newspapers, magazines, and reviews were multiplied; and the old system of selling books by hawkers was extended to the rural districts and small provincial towns. Of the number-books thus produced, the quality was indifferent, with a few exceptions, and the cost of these works was considerable. The principle, however, was then first developed of extending the market by coming into it at regular intervals with fractions of a work so that the humblest customer might lay by each week in a savings-bank of knowledge. Smollett's "History of England" was one of the most successful number-books: it sold to the extent of 20,000 copies, on the first publication of it by the author.

The vast extension of commerce in books may be inferred from some curious facts published by Mr. Charles Knight, of Ludgate-hill. Exclusive of pamphlets and other tracts, the number of new works published in the first fifty-seven years of the last century was 5280, being only an average of ninety-three new works in each year. From 1792 to 1802, eleven years, exclusive of reprints and pamphlets, there were 4096 new works, averaging 372 new books per annum. From 1800 to 1827, excluding as before, the number of new books was 15,888,* showing an annual average of 588 new books; being an increase of 216 per year over the last eleven years of the previous century.

The prices of books having been raised since 1800, an attempt was made in 1827 by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and several of the large booksellers of London and Edinburgh, to reduce them to the old rate of cheapness, without any diminution of excellence. On this principle, several valuable works were published monthly, and numerous weekly periodicals commenced, which, at the price of one penny or three half-pence each, and without the excitement of either religious or political topics, attained a steady sale of from 70,000 to 120,000 numbers.

The new publications on this plan, though mostly consisting of extracts and compilations, appear not to have materially discouraged the production of original works. The following table exhibits the number of new publications, without pamphlets or reprints, of each year from 1828 to 1833, with the number of volumes, and the aggregate price of a single copy of each new work.

1829	1064	1413	879 1 0
1830	1142	1592	873 5 3
1831	1105	1619	939 9 3
1832	1152	1525	807 19 6
1833	1180	1567	831 8 0

All the original and important works, the copyright of which is considered sufficiently valuable to be worth protecting in a court of law, are entered in Stationers' Hall. Judging by this criterion there appears to have been a slight decrease in the production of this description of publications. The following is the number of works entered at the Hall, each year from 1820 to 1831 both inclusive:—

1820	1208	1826	1181

1822	1454	1828	1309
1823	1296	1829	1105
1824	1281	1830	1264
1825	1376	1831	1159

RAILWAYS AND STEAM-NAVIGATION.

Two periods of remarkable improvement in the modes of travelling and carriage conveyance, namely, that by the common roads and that by canal navigation, have been already noticed (pp. 567, 636); and it appropriately belongs to the present reign to record a third, which promises to supersede both its predecessors, and to effect a more sweeping change in locomotive action by land and water than it was possible for the human fancy to conceive. All nations seem in a fair way of becoming one nation, separated only by local administrations and provincial dialects. The poet's prayer, that time and space might be annihilated, has been almost conceded, and the old saw, that "time and tide wait for no man," has been so far inverted that few men feel the slaves of either. This extraordinary revolution is as sudden as universal. The Brindleys and Bridgewater's, the M'Adams, Remies and Telfords, have hardly ceased to live ere their glory begins to dim, their mighty works to dwindle in public estimation, and to be looked upon, like the Egyptian pyramids, or the aqueducts of the ancients, with commingled feelings of astonishment and pity at the wasted toil, the ill-adapted means to ends, compared with the rapid flights of later discoveries.

Both rail-roads and steam-navigation may be considered the inventions of the present century. There were crude attempts previously in both descriptions of mechanical contrivances, but they were either wholly unsuccessful or of such limited utility as to discourage their general adoption. In the Newcastle collieries wooden railways were used in the seventeenth century, and for which, on a limited scale, iron began in 1767 to be substituted as a more durable material. This experiment met with so little encouragement that, thirty years after, a Mr. Carr published a book, claiming to be the first inventor of cast-iron rails. These railways, it may be remarked, were all private undertakings, no public railway was attempted. The first act of parliament for a work of this kind was passed in 1801, and was for the construction of a railway in the vicinity of London, from Wandsworth to Croydon. In the twenty-three years that followed only 21 acts were passed for railways; showing the little alacrity with which the new power was brought into use.

The application of steam to the purpose of propelling vessels in the water, made a contemporary and equally slow progress. It was first suggested by Jonathan Hulls a century ago, and attempted in France, in the United States of America, and on the Forth and Clyde canal, between the years 1781 and 1790. In 1801 an experiment already mentioned (p. 627; see also p. 170, for the first patent) was made on the Thames to navigate vessels by steam. These attempts do not appear to have been encouraging, and it was reserved for a later period successfully to repeat them. The ingenious Robert Fulton, a native of Pennsylvania, having witnessed the experiments of Mr. Miller of Dalswinton, on the Forth and Clyde canal, established a steam-boat in 1806 or 1807, which plied successfully on the river Hudson, between New York and Albany. It is likely that Fulton, who was a very skillful engineer, improved on what he had seen in England, and which emboldened him to claim the merit of the original discovery; but this honour could not be justly conceded to him, and its refusal is said to have preyed so much on his spirits as to have hastened his death, which took place at New York, February 24, 1815. The successful introduction of steamers in this country was a few years later than in America. The first steam-boat that was worked for hire in this kingdom was the Comet, a small vessel of three-horse power, which plied with passengers on the Clyde in 1811; two years later, the Elizabeth, of eight-horse power, and the Clyde, of fourteen-horse power, were placed on the same river. Since that time they have multiplied with astonishing rapidity; they have been adopted in the colonies, and in every civilized community: they are no longer limited to rivers nor lakes, nor seas, but regularly traverse the Atlantic with the safety and punctuality of a stage-coach.

There is another discovery connected with the subjects of this section, in the first introduction of the locomotive carriage. The Sirius and Great Western may be considered great locomotive steam-carriages on the waters, but those on land form a separate and distinct contrivance, though the motive powers of both are derived from the same mighty agent. Railways, for nearly two centuries after their introduction, were considered only as a means of economising, not superseding, animal labour. So early as 1759, the idea of applying steam-power for propelling carriages was thrown out by Dr. Robinson of Glasgow; and, in 1784, Watt, in the specification of one of his patents, stated that it was intended to use his steam-engine for the same purpose; but neither of these philosophers made any effort for reducing their suggestions to practice. In 1787 Mr. Symington exhibited the model of a steam-carriage in Edinburgh, but it was not until 1804 that Trevithick invented and brought into use a machine of this kind upon the railroad of Merthyr Tydvil in Wales.

It is a singular fact in the early history of locomotive carriages that their projectors assumed the existence of a difficulty which is now known to be wholly imaginary; and, like the ancient Romans in the conveyance of water, without a knowledge that it would rise to its level, they resorted to sundry laborious contrivances for overcoming an obstacle that had no existence, and which Nature herself, had she been asked, would have accomplished for them. They assumed that the adhesion of the smooth wheels of the carriage upon the equally smooth iron rail must necessarily be so slight, that, if it should be attempted to drag any considerable weight, the wheels might indeed be driven round, but that the carriage would fail to advance because of the continued slipping of the wheels. The remedies devised for this fancied counteraction were various. One was conceived so valuable that a patent was taken out for it in 1811 by Mr. Blenkinsop of Leeds. It consisted, as the writer well remembers, of a rack placed on the outer side of the rail, into which a toothed wheel worked, and thus secured the progressive motion of the carriage. It was, however, wholly useless—it was an impediment; the simple adhesion of the wheels with the surface of the rails upon which they are moved being by an immutable law amply sufficient to secure the advance, not only of a heavy carriage, but of an enormous load dragged after it. The honour of discovering this oversight is due to Mr. Blackett; but the idea of a want of adhesion had taken such firm hold of the public mind that it was not generally removed till the opening, in 1830, of the Liverpool and Manchester railway.

A second misconception in the history of these inventions deserves to be recorded. It is a fact that of all the railways constructed and contemplated up to the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester line, not one was undertaken with a view to the conveyance of passengers. In the prospectus of that work, a hope was held out that one-half the number of persons then travelling by coaches between the two towns might avail themselves of the railway, in consideration of the lower rate for which they could be conveyed; but the chief inducement held out to subscribers was the conveyance of raw cotton, manufactured goods, coals, and cattle. On the contrary steam-vessels were originally projected for the conveyance, in rivers or coastwise, of passengers only; and they were not employed in this kingdom for the transport of merchandise before the year 1820.

It does not belong to the plan of this work to exhibit the statistics of these extraordinary innovations; only to record in chronological order, their introduction and progress. At the close of the present reign, the island was undergoing and, to a great extent, had undergone an entirely new demarcation with a zeal not less ardent, and capital and intelligence more ample, than signified the beginning of turnpike roads and canal navigation. From London, as a centre, lines are radiating in all directions—east, west, north, and south; and these lines are being met transversely by other lines, crossing and intersecting each other at the great estuaries of population and industry—Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Norwich, and Edinburgh; which a few years hence will form so many grand railway stations, whence individuals may reach any part of the kingdom in almost as short a time as they traverse the metropolis from one part to another, from Charing Cross to Mile End, Paddington, Camberwell, or Turnham Green.

Had not the government adhered so tenaciously to the laissez faire system of undertaking nothing and of interfering with nothing that can be executed by individuals, or the joint means of individuals, it is probable some of the new undertakings might have been carried on with more despatch, economy, and advantage to the public. A revolution is about being effected in internal communications, which forms an exception to the general principle of non-interference. The great thoroughfares of the kingdom are national works: they interest the entire community, and ought not to become the property of individuals but of the state, in which the fee-simple at least ought to be permanently vested. By leaving the great railways to be undertaken at the risk of private adventurers, the mode and cost of travelling will be dependent upon them, and it can be hardly made a subject of complaint hereafter if the projectors seek not only to indemnify themselves for their outlay of capital, but to realize an undefined profit proportioned to the uncertain results of the original speculation. The principle of open competition has had the further disadvantages of causing delay and unnecessary expenditure. Rival companies have competed at an immense cost for different lines, and the interests of private parties have inter-sored to bias the decisions of parliamentary committees; all or a portion of which evils would have been obviated by the government determining, by preliminary surveys, the most eligible lines; leaving only the execution open to general competition. The expenses incurred by the railway companies in these contests, in buying off opposition, and in battling their projects through parliament, has been enormous, as appears from the following statement of parliamentary charges incurred in obtaining acts of incorporation for the following undertakings:—

London and Birmingham . . .	£72,868
Great Western	88,710
London and Southampton . . .	39,040
Midland Counties	28,776
Birmingham and Gloucester . .	12,000
Great North of England . . .	20,526
The Grand Junction	22,757
Bristol and Exeter	18,592

All this outlay will have to be repaid by the public to the proprietors of the roads in the form of excessive fares, in addition to the enormous cost of the works. On the London and Birmingham line of 112 miles, had been expended up to June 30, 1838, eleven weeks before it was opened for traffic throughout, 4,553,557*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*; and, in the opinion of the directors, the entire expenditure would amount to five millions before the works are in all respects complete. It is indicative of some precipitancy in these undertakings, that before the London and Birmingham railway had been finished, the Manchester extension line had been projected, by which the distance between that town and the capital would, by the Grand Junction and the Birmingham, be reduced from 208½ to 179 miles. The total estimated cost of the Great Western railway from London to Bristol, Aug. 15, 1838, was 4,560,928*l.* The total number of acts of parliament obtained for railways from the first in 1801 to 1837 inclusive, has been 174, of which number 97 have been passed in the present reign.

Steam-navigation has had to contend with fewer obstacles than transit and conveyance on land. No act of parliament was requisite for liberty to traverse the great highway of nations. No private interests were to conciliate. All that was required was enterprising capitalists to command suitable vessels, fuel, and machinery. In the first attempts to make long voyages on the ocean, the aid of steam was sought only as an auxiliary to that of the wind and waves. In this way the Enterprise effected the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope in 1825 (p. 823), and that the Savannah crossed the Atlantic in 1819, and the Curacoa in 1828; but the successful experiments of the Great Western and Sirius have shown that 3000 miles of ocean may be traversed with steam as the only motive force. In this way repeated voyages were performed, in 1838, in the short period of 14 or 15 days between Bristol and New York; and vessels have been started for the same service belonging to the ports of London and Liverpool. The same agent has been called into action to facilitate communication with India. Early in June, 1837, an arrangement was concluded between the government and the directors of the East India Company, for the establishment of a regular monthly steam communication between this country and Bombay, by way of the Mediterranean, Suez, and the Red Sea. This route, instead of that by the Cape of Good Hope, reduces the distance nearly one-half, and letters can now be transmitted from London to Bombay in from 44 to 60 days time; or a further economy of time of from four to six days is obtainable by sending the mails overland to Marseilles, from which port steam-packets are despatched three times a month by the French government.

The following statement of the number and tonnage of steam-vessels belonging to the United Kingdom in each year from 1814 to 1837 inclusive, will show the rapid progress of this new marine power. The account is exclusive of steamers employed in river traffic, and which do not therefore require to be provided with a register.

The number of steam-vessels employed under the American flag in 1834 was 386, with the aggregate burden of 96,000 tons; since that year the number has greatly augmented. On the rivers and in the ports of France there were employed in 1835 only 100 steam-vessels, and in 1836 the number was only increased by five vessels.

PROGRESS OF CRIME.

The greater number of crimes against property in England than in any other European country has formed a difficult problem to the philosophical inquirer. Distinguished by superior wealth and a high degree of civilization, it seems extraordinary that we should also be remarkable for a delinquency which is commonly supposed to be most prevalent under the pressure of want and misdirection of ignorance. Great as is this anomaly in our condition, it appears to admit of explanation, and both the magnitude and complexion of the criminal calendar may be traced to peculiarities in the national pursuits and possessions.

England is pre-eminently a mercantile community, abounding in manufactories, docks, wharfs, shipping, and well-stocked shops and warehouses; combined with these, commodities are constantly being transferred from one to another by sale or exchange, which affords opportunities, and enlarges the field of depredation. Commerce requires much personal confidence; clerks, porters, factors, and agents cannot always resist temptation. It is productive of luxury, leads to the assembling people together in large towns—to the creation of credit and paper-money—the intoxicating and illusive stimulant to over-speculation, and fruitful source of offences. It leads to sudden vicissitudes in men's fortunes, produces extreme inequality of rank, avidity of gain, and contempt for poverty; in short, makes a violent thirst for riches the predominant passion; and offences connected therewith the prominent trait of the community. Where there is little chattel property there cannot be much theft, either from the person, house, warehouse, or in transfer; where there is little agency embezzlement and breaches of trust must seldom occur, and where men, as in agricultural countries, form a fixed caste, liable to no unexpected alternations of condition, they are exempt from the vicious excitements to which sudden wealth or raging poverty is exposed. Hence, it is apprehended, may be traced the predominance of crimes against property in this country. We are peculiarly an enterprising, industrious, and emulative people; the range for plunder is wider and more seductive, the necessities of individuals more sudden and urgent, and the frequent ebb and flow in their circumstances begot a reckless excitement which makes them little scrupulous about the means they employ to better their lot or repair their disasters.

On the other hand we are an enlightened people, and this seems to account for the second trait of criminal propensity in the comparative fewness of offences against the person. Crimes accompanied with personal violence, and indicating greater depravity of heart, are fewer in England than on the continent. We are, in fact, too calculating a people to give way to the unprofitable impulses of passion, and hence crimes originating in revenge, jealousy, lust, or mere atrocity, do not frequently occur. Our offences are mercantile like our pursuits; even highway robbery is nearly extinct among us, and the depredations chiefly followed are burglary, forgery, coining, swindling, theft, pocket-picking, fraudulent insolvencies, and smuggling. They indicate no personal hostility to mankind, only a culpable mode of seeking those objects that are in general request and form the staple social distinction.

It is only by taking into consideration the influence of riches and poverty, of sudden vicissitudes of condition, of commerce and manufacturing industry, and of a state of foreign war or peace, that we can satisfactorily explain the anomalies in the history of crime. A moderate share of adversity is usually deemed favourable to the formation of virtuous habits; and by a contrary action a long course of public prosperity may tend to national demoralization. It is certainly observable that every general peace is mostly followed by increased licentiousness in manners, avarice, and criminality. The twelve years of uninterrupted peace during the reign of George I. were distinguished by the profligacy of individuals, impiety, and the indulgence of every criminal passion. In like manner, the pacific era of George II. poured into the country a flood of wealth and luxury, attended with their wonted disorders (see pp. 367, 423). Smollett, speaking of the general prosperity of the community, says, "Commerce and manufactures flourished again to such a degree of increase as had never been known in this island; but this advantage was attended with an irresistible tide of luxury and excess, which flowed through all degrees of the people, breaking down all the moulds of civil policy, and opening a way for licentiousness and immorality. The highways were infested with rapine and assassination; the cities teemed with the brutal votaries of lewdness, intemperance, and profligacy." Descending to the following reign we find a similar association.

The country was intoxicated with prosperity immediately after the general peace of 1763, and the profligacy, both in private individuals and public men, which distinguished that era far transcends modern examples. The state of society immediately preceding the French revolutionary war, when the country had attained a very high pitch of prosperity, affords further proof of our general position. Many living individuals can bear testimony to the after-dinner drinking, licentiousness, and debauchery, which then pervaded even the middle orders of the community; and the occurrences recorded in the Chronicle, just before and after that period, attest the violence, disorder, and corruption raging in the metropolis. The environs and outskirts of the town were overrun with footpads and highwaymen; burglary and housebreaking were crimes of the most ordinary occurrence; and gangs of villains, fifteen or twenty in number, used to parade the streets, in open defiance of the police, and plunder and ill-treat every passenger they met with impunity. It was to remedy these enormous evils, and reform an inefficient and corrupt magistracy, that Messrs. Dundas, Burton, and Wilberforce introduced the plan of a permanent stipendiary police, which soon proved one of the greatest improvements ever made in the municipal government of London.

The deteriorating effects of sudden vicissitudes and mercantile avidity may be elucidated by the example of 1825-6. The disastrous convulsion of that period was the natural consequence of the causes which had been slowly operating since the peace of 1815, and which till then had not reached their full development. It grew out of a vast accumulation of capital, and men, almost delirious with real or fictitious riches, seemed absolved from moral and social ties. Every class was infected, from the peer to the commoner; those deemed respectable, as well as the reputedly infamous, appeared promiscuously loosened to run a race of fraud and speculative rapacity. Can it be matter of surprise that offences multiplied, when not a single class in the community remained whose entire purity and example offered a reproach to the general turpitude?

The effects of a long pacific era are not limited to the criminal extravagances produced by redundant wealth; a species of immoral energy is generated among the population, for which there exists no legitimate outlet. Every one must have remarked in the circle in which he moves, whether living in a large town or country village, at college or at school, in a counting-house or manufactory, that a number of depraved and unruly spirits, in every grade of life, are constantly rising to the surface at the age of adolescence; possessed of strong passions, of ardent and irregular minds, they have no aptitude for steady industry, nor the quiet pursuits which are their inheritance. In time of war the army and navy open to them a congenial field of enterprise; the recruiting sergeant, aided by 'the soul-stirring drum,' collects them, through the country, and, after being a source of domestic disorder and social annoyance, those of the better families obtain commissions, while the less opulent file in the ranks or man the fleet. In peace these channels are closed, the reckless and dissipated hang loose and unattached in the community, and, for want of suitable occupation, raise an intestine commotion against the laws and usages of civil life. The unsettled, courageous, and enterprising among the working classes resort to emigration, poaching, smuggling, or sedition—those of the middle orders, who have no alternative but trade, for which they are unfit, soon become bankrupt, whence they graduate as sporting men, gamblers, and fraudulent dealers. The remainder of the route need not be followed; from poaching, smuggling, habitual gambling and unprincipled traffic, the road to darker delinquencies is short, broad, and obvious.

It is scarcely necessary to explain that the preceding observations, on the derivation of the personnel of the army and navy, do not apply to the entire of these professions: many enter both branches of service of virtuous dispositions, of richly cultivated minds, actuated only by a thirst for romantic adventure and chivalrous distinction. Neither ought it to be inferred that peace is a national calamity; like every human good, it is not without alloy, but it is obvious that a small addition to the criminal calendar is a trifle compared with the countless miseries inflicted on society by warfare. It must form an unimportant consideration in the estimation of the legislator, that there are a few whose element is storm and strife, or whose ephemeral prosperity renders them frantic and vicious against the far greater number to whom peace yields plenteousness and quiet enjoyment, and against those national improvements in laws and institutions, in the general diffusion of literature and science, in works of utility and magnificence, which her beneficent sway tends to cherish and introduce. Our aim has been to show the connexion between peace and the growth of delinquency; it would have been easy to array overwhelming countervailing benefits to society, but our purpose was limited to an elucidation of some of the causes that may have helped, in the existing state of educational culture, to give the character to the criminal returns to which we are going to advert.

The public attention to the increase of crime was especially directed in 1828 by the reports of two parliamentary committees, one on the police of the metropolis, the other on criminal commitments in England and Wales. It appeared from these inquiries that the total committals for offences in London and Middlesex, from 1811 to 1817, amounted to 13,415; in an equal period from 1821 to 1827, to 19,883; being an average annual increase of 924, or 48 per cent. The increase of convictions was 642 per annum or 55 per cent. But the population was computed to have increased 19 per cent.; leaving of the committals 29 per cent., and of the convictions 36 per cent., to be accounted for by other causes than the increase of population. In the country crime was found to have increased more rapidly than in the metropolis; commitments having increased 86 per cent., and convictions 105 per cent.; while population had only increased in the provinces 16½ per cent.

The class of offences that had chiefly multiplied were those against property. The darker and more atrocious class of crimes, those directed against the person, it was alleged, had not increased so fast as population, and the parliamentary committee on commitments affirmed that "life and limb" were never less exposed to violence. The causes assigned for the increase of crime in the metropolis were principally the increase in population—the cheapness of spirituous liquors—the neglect of children by their parents—the want of employment—absence of suitable provisions for juvenile delinquents—defective prison discipline and police. To these were added other causes by the committee on committals, as more peculiar to the country, and accounting partly for an increase of crime, and partly for its 'greater exhibition to public view' without evidencing any virtual increase of depravity—namely, the payment of prosecutors their expenses in cases of misdemeanor—the malicious trespass act—decline in domestic superintendence—readiness with which magistrates commit for offences—defective and unsuitable punishments—improvement in the art of crime faster than the art of detection, and bringing before the tribunals petty offences which were formerly either settled by summary chastisement inflicted by the sufferer on the delinquent, or passed over without magisterial cognizance. All these circumstances, as well as the more general causes adverted to at the beginning of this article, may have contributed in different degrees to swell the criminal calendar. They may have been so energetic in counteraction as to outweigh the benefits resulting from improvements in criminal law, and the moral influence of the popular diffusion of knowledge.

Since the inquiries of 1828 there has been some fluctuation in the progress of offences; in some years they have decreased, but this diminution has been more than counterbalanced by the accelerated increase of succeeding years, so that the general result is that crimes have increased at a faster rate than the population. The following table will render the whole subject intelligible by presenting it in one view; showing the progress of crime during the war, and subsequently to the end of the present reign:—

The criminal tables have been much improved during the last four years, by a careful classification of offences, the distinction of the sexes of offenders, their ages, and the degree of education they had received. The number of committals stated above exceeds the number of offenders, many persons for larcenies and other misdemeanors being committed twice, thrice, or oftener in the same year, so that the number in the fourth column rather represents the annual proportion of offences than offenders to the population. Previously to the year 1834 the offences of conspiring to raise wages, riots, breaches of the peace, keeping disorderly houses, and assaults on constables, were not included in the criminal returns. It is these which swell the committals of that year to 22,451; whereas there was an actual decrease of crime in 1834, and had the former practice been adhered to, by the omission of the offences just mentioned, the number of committals would have been only 19,927.

The statistics of crime are a questionable criterion of the standard of national morals and civilization. The table above exhibits an enormous increase, since the beginning of the century, in the number of delinquents, without affording conclusive proof of deterioration in the manners of the people. During the war, as already explained, many found a refuge in the army and navy, who, since the peace, have worked out a reckless course in the gaols and prisons, the colonial dependencies, and penal settlements of the empire. The slow increase of female offenders has always appeared to the writer satisfactory evidence that national character has not degenerated; for, had there been a growing depravity in the community, it must have been shared in by the women as well as the men; and the existence of it would have been attested by a corresponding augmentation in the number of feminine committals. The reason that offences have increased among the men is that commercial property, and transactions connected with property, have increased. Females have been much less affected by this revolution than the males, and hence, while the number of committals of the former has increased from 1805 to 1837 only 214 per cent., that of the latter has increased 494 per cent. The committals of the sexes during this period were as follows:—

Years.	Males.	Females.
1810 .	3,733	1,413
1815 .	6,036	1,782

has been reluctantly admitted, probably admits of explanation by reference to the principles mentioned. It has been found that the most educated districts are the most criminal, but it would be extremely erroneous to infer from hence that the greater proportion of crime is the consequence of education. The most instructed portion of a population is usually found in the parts most densely peopled; they are the inhabitants of towns, abounding in riches, and whose occupations are commercial and manufacturing. Their criminality is not a result of superior instruction, but in defiance of its checks and admonitions—the consequence of greater temptations and a more changeable condition, which are incidents of their lot perfectly reconcilable with a higher state of social happiness than that enjoyed by the agricultural classes.

A great experiment has been for some years in progress in criminal legislation in the gradual abolition of capital punishments. During the war, and until the £. notes of the Bank of England were withdrawn from circulation, many were yearly executed for forgery. Forgery of every description has now ceased to be a capital offence. In 1837 the number of offences to which the extreme penalty of the law could be applied, were reduced to treason, murder, rape, sodomy, burglary, robbery with violence, and arson with intent to commit murder. Under the severity of the old law, great numbers annually suffered death. In the 26 years from 1805 to 1830 the total number of capital executions in England and Wales was 1938; being above 74 per annum. In the three years ending in 1820, 1830, and 1836, the number of executions was respectively 312, 178, and 85. In 1836 there were 17 executions; in 1837 only eight, all of which were for murders of an atrocious character.

The time of experience is yet too brief to afford a safe ground for concluding on the practical tendency of the milder system of punishments. It forms an interesting subject of moral investigation to trace the influence on crime of changes in the laws, and of the alterations in the condition of the people produced by peace or war, prosperous or adverse circumstances, vicissitudes of the seasons, ignorance and knowledge, transitions from rural to manufacturing industry, and all the other elements that enter into the formation of national character. Most, if not all, the data for this inquiry may be found in the preceding pages of this work, and will be easily brought to bear by the reader to elucidate the progress of criminality. The short term of the present reign has been remarkable for a decrease, but still more for an increase of delinquency. The decrease of crime, which commenced in 1829, and continued through the two following years, amounting in the aggregate to 13 per cent., appears, in 1836, to have suffered a slight check. In that year crime increased one per cent. In 1837 the increase of offenders was far more considerable, amounting to 2,628 persons, or nearly 12½ per cent.; exceeding by 11 per cent. the computed rate of increase in the population. This increase has taken place in 33 English counties, and in both North and South Wales. In the county of Northampton the increase was 59 per cent., and in each of the counties of Stafford, Cornwall, Leicester, Wilts, Bucks, Dorset, and Berks, the increase was upwards of 30 per cent. It was only in the seven counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Bedford, Norfolk, Cambridge, Suffolk, and Huntingdon, that there was a decrease. Two causes assigned for the augmentation of offenders are the increased proportion of apprehensions consequent on the establishment of a more efficient police in the municipal towns, and to the greater facilities afforded for criminal proceedings.

These changes may account for a temporary increase in the committals, but this is not the main issue to be tried. Crimes may multiply or diminish in particular years, from transitory and obvious causes; but the momentous fact to be investigated is the cause of the average and steady growth of delinquency since the beginning of the present century. This is the problem for scrutiny, and which requires a general, not a local or temporary, solution.

The phenomenon cannot be explained by any great moral revolution the country has undergone. During the last forty years there has been neither political, religious, institutional, or educational change, adequate to account for this lamentable alteration in the national character. Knowledge has become more diffused, but no new principles of action have been disseminated among the masses, tending to give a more criminal direction to the popular mind. The great alterations in the social structure have been physical rather than moral or intellectual. In this respect, society has undergone an organic revolution. The predominant industrial occupations of the community have changed from the agricultural to the manufacturing and metropolitan. This cause has been constant and progressive in its course, contemporary with the accelerated growth of delinquency; and in this transition, and the consequent riches that have accompanied it, may be traced, we suspect, the primary origin of the increase in property-offences.

That a metropolitan and manufacturing population is more criminal than an agricultural people will be manifest from an inspection of the table we subjoin. Take the numbers for the year 1832. In Middlesex one out of every 360 of the population was an offender, and in Lancaster, one out of every 501. Compare these results with the great rural counties of Devon and Lincoln, where the proportion of offenders is only one in 1028, and one in 1659 of the inhabitants. In the year 1837 a corresponding relation is observable, though it is remarkable that in the intervening five years, the agricultural counties have approximated in the darker complexion of their criminal proportions nearer to those of London and the provincial towns.

Subjoined is the classification alluded to, exhibiting the whole of the English counties ranged according to their industrial character, and the proportion of offenders to the population of each county as returned in the census of 1831:

A cursory glance at the above shows that crime is less prevalent in the agricultural than in the metropolitan and manufacturing counties. In 1832 the proportions were in

Manufacturing and mining . . . one in 771
Metropolitan and manufacturing do. . . 862
Agricultural counties . . . do. 1139

This was the fact sought to be demonstrated. It satisfactorily unravels the mystery of an increase of crime since the peace of Amiens. The metropolitan and manufacturing population, which is the most delinquent, having increased faster than the agricultural, there has been an aggregate increase in the number of offences. This conclusion will appear irrefragable and less liable to objection, by bringing into comparison only the larger counties of each industrial class, as follows:—

In 1832, in the seven manufacturing counties, one criminal to 665 of the population; in two metropolitan counties, one in 443; and in nine agricultural counties, only one criminal to 960 of the population. The cause of the predominance of crime in manufacturing districts has been already explained; it is no proof of greater general depravity, but compatible with a higher standard of morals, more physical enjoyment, and greater security to persons and property. In Scotland, in 1832, there was only one offender to 973 of the inhabitants, and in Wales only one to 2348; owing doubtless to the less riches and greater predominance of rural industry in these divisions of the kingdom. In respect of crimes against property, Spain is three times less vicious than France, and seven times less criminal than England. The reason is obvious enough. In Spain, crimes, if committed at all, must be crimes against the person (and such predominate), not against property, since there comparatively is none. It is hard to be a thief where there is nothing to steal; you cannot, as the Scotch proverb says, steal the "brecks" from nudity. Hence the peculiarities in the Spanish criminal calendar. No one who is acquainted with the three countries infers that the moral character of Spain is superior, or even equal, to that of France or England.

The criminal returns for England and Wales for 1837 present remarkable results. The centesimal increase of crime in that year beyond 1836 was nearly 12.5 per cent. This enormous addition ought to fix general attention. By glancing at the last comparative table may be perceived the relative state of crime in 1832 and 1837 in different parts of the country. Crime in the interval appears to have been nearly stationary in the manufacturing counties, but to have increased enormously in the agricultural districts. In 1832 the ratio was only one in 960; in 1837 it had increased to one in 643 of the rural population. There has been no improvement in rural police, as in municipal towns, to account for the increase of apprehensions; consequently there must have been a positive increase of delinquency. The rustic population is rapidly approximating, in its dark traits, to that of towns, without the temptations or countervailing benefits of manufacturing industry. In Ireland, where the state of society is notoriously distempered, the proportion of committals to the population was, in 1832, 1 in 565; in 1834, 1 in 363; and in 1836, 1 in 325: the returns from which these proportions have been deduced, are not much to be relied upon; but, if they be near the truth, they indicate a degree of criminality in the first-mentioned period, not greatly exceeding that of England in 1837. The only legislative change, during the last five years, affecting the agricultural classes, has been the introduction of the Poor Law Amendment Act. It is in the rural districts that this experimental measure has been most generally and sharply introduced. How far its introduction may have tended to deteriorate the character of the labourers in husbandry—to drive indigent from the workhouse to the gaol—to convert the pauper into a criminal—are matters seriously deserving the consideration of parliament. The “considerable increase in sheep-stealing in each of the last two years, and in larceny by servants,” which is noticed in the Criminal Tables of the Home Office, for 1837 (page 2), indicates a pressure on the labouring classes that did not previously exist.

The Criminal Returns for England and Wales, for 1836 and 1837, specify the degree of instruction offenders had received. The decimal proportions, at these periods, are as under:—

	1836.	1837.
Unable to read and write .	33·52	35·37
Able to read and write imperfectly	52·33	52·08
Able to read and write well	10·56	9·46
Instruction, superior to reading and writing well	0·91	0·43
Instruction could not be ascertained	2·68	2·18

Mr. Redgrave, in his synopsis of the returns, says, that of 358 offenders in 1837, “aged 12 years and under, 50 per cent. were uninstructed; 48 per cent. were able to read and write imperfectly, and little more than 1 per cent. to read and write well.”

In France, crimes against the person are more numerous, and against property fewer than in England. The proportion of the former is 1 in 2188 of the population; of the latter 1 in 1766. Comparing this with England, the proportion of personal offences is 1 in 9629; and of property offences, 1 in 955 of the population. (Companion to the Almanac for 1836, p. 59).

CRIME IN THE METROPOLIS.

Comparative Statement of the Number of Individuals taken into Custody by the Metropolitan Police for the years 1831-2-3-4.

	1831.	1832.	1833.	1834.
Taken into custody	72,824	77,543	69,959	64,269
Summarily convicted by the magistrates	21,843	23,458	20,791	26,302
Discharged by the magistrates	48,026	50,429	45,496	34,499

A very large proportion of the charges before the magistrates are of a minor character. In 1833, it appears 45,496 charges were dismissed by the magistrates without ulterior proceedings. The largest items in the catalogue of offences in that year, were—

Drunken charges brought before the magistrates	11,393
Drunken charges discharged by the superintendents	18,487
Disorderly characters	5,721
Prostitutes	3,427
Assaults	5,721
Larcenies	7,858
Suspicious characters	3,201
Vagrants	6,721

Out of the large number of 29,800 drunkards, no less than 12,000 were females!

The total expenditure on account of the metropolitan police, for the year ending Dec. 31, 1836, was 216,313*l*.

These statements do not include the crime and police of the city of London.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—Number of visits made to the reading-rooms, for the purpose of study and research, about 1950 in 1810; 63,466 in 1835; 62,360 in 1836; 69,936 in 1837. 1830-1837 . .	William IV.	29

A creation of peers has mostly taken place on the accession of a new family, the commencement of a new reign, or to carry political measures. On the death of queen Elizabeth the peers only amounted to 56. James, being the first of a new dynasty, raised the number to 105, and Charles I. to 135; Charles II. created 15 dukes, (six of whom were his natural children,) 1 marquises, 37 earls, 3 countesses, 2 viscounts, and 29 barons. At the revolution, William III. raised 8 powerful earls to dukedoms; created 18 earls, 3 viscounts, and 9 barons. Anne increased the peerage to 170. The accession of the house of Brunswick gave rise to new creations. George I. either created or elevated no fewer than 49 peers. George II. left 184. It is evident that the great increase of the peerage was in the reign of George III., being more than doubled. In 1777 a batch of peers was drafted from the commons into the lords, to effect a ministerial majority. This expedient was frequently resorted to by Mr. Pitt. In 1797 ten peers were made. He nearly created the order of marquises: he made 10 marquises in England where there was but one; and 9 in Ireland, where there was none. Knighthood was also freely bestowed. No doubt this lavish distribution of honours was partly the consequence of the war, and of the vastly increasing riches of the middle classes.

The peers created during the long reign of George III. have been classified (Quarterly Review, lxxxiv. 314) as follows:—

Scotch peers, 34; law, 26; state, 23; army, 13; navy, 10; younger sons and younger branches of peers, 17; renewals, 7; confirmations, 7; peeresses, 5; total 235: from which must be deducted 74 extinctions, making the additions to the peerage 161.

George IV. added 64 members to the upper house. In this number are included individuals who were raised to the peerage, or in whose favour an abeyance terminated, as well as peers of Scotland and Ireland who obtained English baronies. It does not, however, include Scotch peerages which were restored, nor the creation of peers of Ireland; of claims to English peerages which were admitted, nor elevations of English peerages to higher honours. The average rate at which peers were created during the two former reigns was four per annum; and was the same rate of increase to continue for a century, it would double the existing number of parliamentary lords.

The political character of the peers created is naturally determined by that of the ministry of the time, from whom their honours are received. Toryism being the ascendant school of politics during the reign of George III. and his successor, the peers created mostly belonged to that denomination of statesmen. This fact was manifest on the first introduction of the Reform Bill into the house of lords. Of the old peers of the United Kingdom, there was a majority of two for the second reading of the bill. Of the new peers of the United Kingdom, created subsequent to 1792, the majority was against the second reading of the bill, and their number was only balanced by the creations of the whig ministry.

The number of peers who sat in the house of lords at the death of George IV. was 403, and which number increased, during the reign of his successor, to 432.

From this table it appears that in the 461 years preceding the reign of George III. there were 202 parliaments, whose average duration was $2\frac{1}{2}$ years; and that in 210 years preceding the reign of Henry VIII. there were 143 parliaments, averaging rather less than $1\frac{1}{2}$ year each. In the 69 years of the reigns of George III. and IV. there were only 13 parliaments, averaging five years and one-third each. In the reign of William IV. there were four two before and two after the Reform Act.

Total of the House of Commons 658

The boroughs which returned members under the old system of representation were of three sorts: first, the close or pocket-boroughs, in which the power of returning the members was exercised by one or two individuals; secondly, the corporation or charter-boroughs, in which the members were returned by a dozen or more of self-elected corporators, mostly under the control of peers or commoners; thirdly, the open boroughs, in which the electors varied in number from 500 to 10,000 and upwards. These last, with the exception of the cities of Westminster and London, and one or two others, were as marketable as the rest; many of the voters were non-residents, and consisting generally of the poorer class of freemen and householders, they openly sold their franchises to the highest bidder. It has been calculated that under the old representation, exclusive of county and metropolitan electors, three-fourths of the remaining body of electors in England belonged to the labouring classes.

The preceding tables show the progress and state of parliamentary representation up to the passing of the Reform Bill; the following will show the changes effected by the Grey ministry. The population of the boroughs disfranchised and enfranchised has been taken from the census of 1831.

In 1835-6 the number of registered electors had increased over the registration of 1834-5, in the English counties 78,297, equal to 21 per cent; in Wales 5,102, equal to 19 per cent; in Scotland 5,208, equal to 14 per cent. The borough electors in England had increased 28,052, equal to 10.4 per cent.

Comparing 1834-5 with the first registration under the Reform Act, in 1832, it appears that the number of registered electors in the interval, in the United Kingdom, had increased 26,435, equal to 3.4 per cent.

The county population in Britain was estimated, in 1832, at 10,446,241; borough population, 5,816,060. Members for counties, 189; members for boroughs, 364. So that the county population was two to one against the town, and the town representation two to one against the county.

In Ireland the case is different. The county representation exceeds the borough representation; but the county population is rated at 7,000,000, and the borough at little more than 700,000. Taking Britain and Ireland together, the population of cities and boroughs is about one-third of the population of counties, and the electors for counties are to the electors for towns about as four to three.

The above statements of the number of electors do not include the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, Trinity College, Dublin, nor the Isle of Wight.

The number of individuals is less than the number of electors on the register. The same elector being occasionally inserted twice or oftener, in respect of different rights of voting for the county and borough, as freeholder, occupier, and burgess.

The number who actually vote in a general election is always less than the number registered. But no official return is made of the voters; the returning officers sending to the crown office only the names of the members elected, leaving to the newspapers to record the state of the poll, which is frequently incorrect.

The number of voters will also depend on the number of contested elections. The number of contests in 1835 was 223; in 1837, 244. The number of votes given in the former for sir R. Peel's parliament was estimated to amount to 595,000; in the latter, for viscount Melbourne's, to about 760,000.

According to calculations founded on the report of a parliamentary committee on election expenses, in 1834, it appears that 170 members for boroughs, being just one-half of those returned in England and Wales, are elected by 49,153 persons, being on the average 1 member for every 289 electors.

Of these, 32 places whose constituencies do not exceed 300, return 44 members.

The borough included, which has the smallest number of registered votes, is Thetford, in the county of Norfolk. In that place 146 electors return 2 members.

There are only four other boroughs, the numbers of whose electors are under 200. These are Ashburton with 198, Reigate with 152, Calne with 191, and Westbury with 185 electors. These places return only one member each.

It can hardly be thought that the system of representation has been rendered too popular, when it is thus shown that 70 members—being more than one-fourth of the total number of representatives for the United Kingdom—are returned by 49,153 electors, a number forming no more than the 118th part of the males above twenty years of age. At the same time that must be admitted to be a great improvement, which has transferred even to this comparatively small proportion of the people a franchise which was previously exercised by a very few individuals, belonging chiefly to the aristocracy.

The expenses of the revising barristers were, in 1834, 22,500*l.*; in 1835, 32,700*l.*; in 1836, 44,704*l.*

The following tables will show the increasing quantity of business that has come before the house of commons during the present century, the quantity of business discharged, and the duration of each session.

The average of the first ten years is only 13 volumes; while the average of the last ten years is 36. The entire series of house of commons papers from 1701 to 1809 are contained in 15 volumes large folio. (Hansard's Letter to Sir R. H. Inglis, Sess. Paper 600—1832.) So that the house now print more than three times as many papers in a year as they formerly did in a century.

From this table it will be seen that the ratio of increase in the public petitions presented within the last twenty-five years has been as 24 to 1, and since the close of the war as 6 to 1; that the number received in 1831 alone was nearly twice, and the number received during the fourth period nearly six times, as great as the number received during the whole of the three preceding periods taken together.

Hours of Sitting.—In 1606 an order was moved and settled for the meeting of the House at eight o'clock in the morning. In 1614, seven o'clock was made the hour of meeting; and all second readings of bills were directed to be proceeded with at eight o'clock. Ten years after this period, the time of meeting was fixed at half-past seven o'clock. In 1641, eight o'clock was appointed the hour for prayers, and all members absent at prayers were liable to a fine of one shilling, and, if absent for a whole day, to a fine of five shillings. The hour from which the fine of one shilling should be exigible, was afterwards altered to nine o'clock. In those primitive times the House rose at noon; and so determined were the members to observe this rule, that any one who commenced a new motion after twelve o'clock was liable to a fine of five shillings. — Mercurius, 14 Februarii, 1643. The hour for commencing public business was, after the Revolution (Nov. 19, 1694), altered to ten o'clock; at a later period, ten o'clock was fixed as the hour of the House's meeting, and so nominally continued up to the meeting of the Reform Parliament, when new regulations (see p. 931) were adopted both as respects petitions and the hours of business.

ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS.

The subjoined tables of the amount and distribution of the revenues of the church of England, are abstracted from the reports of the ecclesiastical commissioners, especially the important report on ecclesiastical revenues, dated June 16, 1835. The returns of revenue were made on the average of the three years ending December 31, 1831. According to these returns, the gross annual revenues of the English church are 3,738,951*l.*; the net annual revenues, 3,439,767*l.* These revenues are thus distributed:

	Gross revenue.	Net revenue.
Archbishops and bishops . .	£181,631	£160,092
Dignitaries . . .	360,095	274,754
Rectors and vicars . .	3,197,225	3,004,721

Average amount of episcopal income, if equally divided, 5936*l*. The commissioners, in their report dated March 7, 1835, recommend various alterations of the boundaries of the dioceses, the union of the sees of Llandaff and Bristol, and the erection of two new sees in the province of York, one at Manchester, the other at Ripon. Speaking of the incomes of the sees, they say,—“We are of opinion that where the annual income of a bishop amounts to 4500*l*. it is not necessary to make any addition; nor would we recommend any diminution unless it exceeded 5500*l*. But we think that the two archbishoprics, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, ought to have a larger provision than the rest.” Accordingly in a subsequent Report, dated May 20, 1836, the commissioners fixed the average incomes of these dioceses as follows:—Canterbury, 15,000*l*.; York, 10,000*l*.; London, 10,000*l*.; Durham, 8000*l*.; Winchester, 9000*l*. Agreeably with these suggestions, the established church bill of 1836, the 6 & 7 Wm. 4. c. 77, fixing the future incomes of the prelates, was passed.

From the above it appears there are thirty-two cathedral and collegiate foundations, whose net divisible revenues amount to 184,123*l*., and that the number of persons among whom this aggregate revenue is divided is 261; making the annual average share of each 705*l*. There are also 10 minor incorporations of canons, who have an aggregate revenue of 475*l*., divisible among 69 persons, making the average share of each 68*l*.

In addition to the aggregate revenues above of the chapters, there are separate revenues of the several prebends and other ecclesiastical preferments in cathedrals and collegiate churches, the net yearly income of which is 44,703*l*.

The cathedral chapters are of two kinds: first, the deans and chapters of the old foundation; secondly, those of the new foundation. The former class comprehends all those cathedral establishments which were founded at different periods before the reign of Henry VIII.; the latter, those which were founded by letters-patent from the crown, confirmed by parliament about the time of the Reformation. The old foundations comprise not only the dean and canons-residentiary, who compose the chapters of each, but various other prebendaries, who are not required to keep any residence at the cathedral, nor to perform any other duty except that of preaching one or two sermons in each year. The prebendaries who are not residentiaries have no share of the corporate revenues, except, in some cases, small fixed payments, but in most instances possess each a separate endowment. In the chapters on the new foundation, on the contrary, there are no prebendaries besides the residentiaries, and except at Durham and Ely they have no separate estates. The dean, independently of statutable allowances, mostly double those of the prebendaries, receives, on the division of the fines, a twofold share.

179 benefices were not returned to the commissioners, but the value of them has been included in the average estimate, calculated upon the average of those returned.

The total number of benefices in England and Wales, including those not returned, but exclusive of those annexed to other preferments (24 in number) is 10,718.

If the amount of the curates' stipends, which is included in the income of the incumbents, be abstracted therefrom, the aggregate net income of incumbents, or rather of benefices (for, many of the incumbents being pluralists, the number of individuals is considerably less than that of benefices), will be reduced to 2,579,961*l.*, giving an average of 244*l.* to each.

The two most valuable livings are the rectory of Stanhope, in Northumberland, 4843*l.*; and the rectory of Doddington, in Cambridgeshire, 7306*l.* per annum.

As the patronage is frequently divided between different classes of patrons, and is included under each, it is obvious that the aggregate total of the above numbers will not agree with the total number of benefices.

An appropriation is when the tithes of a benefice, instead of being in the hands of the parson, are appropriated to a bishopric, prebend, college, or other spiritual corporation; if in the hands of a layman, it becomes an impropriation.

121 vicarages are partly, and 132 wholly, endowed with the great tithes.

The number of vicarages of which the impropriations have not been returned to the commissioners is 223.

CHURCH OF IRELAND.

The following summary is taken from the appendix to the first report of the commissioners of public instruction for Ireland.

The total population of Ireland in 1834 was 7,954,100; of which 6,436,060 were Roman catholics, 853,160 members of the established church, 643,058 presbyterians, and 21,882 belonged to other religious denominations. It results from this statement that the proportion per cent. of each denomination to the total population is as follows:—Roman catholics, 80.8; members of the established church, 10.7; presbyterians, 8.1; other protestant dissenters, 0.4.

The number of places of worship in Ireland is 4502; of which 2109 belong to Roman catholics, 1537 to the established church, 452 to the presbyterians, and 404 to various other sects.

The total number of parishes or ecclesiastical districts is 2408, and of this number 2351 possess a provision for the care of souls, and 57, containing 3030 members of the established church, are without any such provision.

The total number of benefices is 1387, viz., 908 consisting of single parishes, and 479 being unions of two or more parishes. In 87 of these unions the parishes are not contiguous. A glebe-house is attached to 851 benefices; to the other 536 no glebe-house is attached.

The number of benefices in which there is more than one church is 118; in which there is only one church, 1059; in which there is no church, 210.

The incumbent is resident on 890 benefices; in 340 the incumbent is non-resident, but divine service is performed by him or a curate in a place of worship; and there are 157 benefices in which the incumbent is non-resident, and no divine service is performed.

In five benefices the population is not more than 100; in 7, is between 100 and 200; in 36, between 200 and 500; in 94, between 500 and 1000; in 368, between 1000 and 3000; in 278, between 3000 and 5000; in 406, between 5000 and 10,000; in 125, between 10,000 and 15,000; in 39, between 15,000 and 20,000; in 21 between 20,000 and 30,000; and in 8 the population exceeds 30,000.

In 41 benefices there is not a single member of the established church; in 99, the number is under 20; in 124, there are more than 20, and not more than 50; in 161, there are between 50 and 100; in 224, between 100 and 200; in 286, between 200 and 500; in 210, between 500 and 1000; in 139, between 1000 and 2000; in 91 between 2000 and 5000; and there are 12 benefices in which the number of members belonging to the established church exceeds 5000.

In the Irish tithe bill, introduced by Lord Morpeth, June 3d, 1836, it was proposed to reduce the 1387 benefices of Ireland to 1250, with an average net income of 294*l*. Under this arrangement the ecclesiastical establishment of the United Kingdom would have been as under:—

	Benefices.	Of income.	Population.	Acres.	Square Miles.
England and Wales	10,718	£285	1,014	3,460	5
Scotland	900	240	2,770	21,048	32
Presbyterians of Ulster	200	155	2,500	15,903	40
Established Church in Ireland	1,250	294	681	10,000	13 to 14

Education.—The number of schools in Ireland, in connexion with the National Board, is 892; in connexion with the Association for discountenancing vice, 203; Erasmus Smith's fund, 115; Kildare-street society, 235; London Hibernian society, 618; other schools, 771. The proportion of daily schools to the population is, therefore, as 1 to 824. In the ecclesiastical province of Armagh it is as 1 to 698; province of Dublin, 1 to 774; province of Cashel, 1 to 1008; province of Tuam, 1 to 994.

The total number of children receiving daily instruction is 633,946. The proportion per cent. to the population is, therefore, 7.9; to the population of the province of Armagh, 9.4; province of Dublin, 7.4; Cashel, 5.1; Tuam, 6.1.

DISSENTERS IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

The following statement is not derived from official sources. It is the result of inquiries instituted by the dissenters into the number of established and non-established places of worship in England and Wales, and the details from which the table was drawn up were first published in a supplement to the Congregational Magazine for December 1829. In the absence of a more authorized document, it is probably the best and latest account extant of the distribution of religious denominations, and will conclude the subject of the Ecclesiastical Statistics of the United Kingdom.

Commerce with India was nearly stationary from 1805 to 1814; the partial opening of the trade to individual enterprise in the latter year gave an impulse to exports, particularly since 1826; so that, contrasting the amount of commerce in 1814 with 1835, there had been an increase of 133 per cent. The opening of the trade with China gave a farther impulse to mercantile intercourse with the East. This trade was thrown open on the expiration of the charter of the East India Company in April 1834. Since that time the declared value of English manufactures ex-

During the last seven years of the company's exclusive privilege, the importation of raw silk from China averaged 77,136*lbs.* per annum; in 1834 the quantity imported rose to 582,834*lbs.* In the article of Tea the increase was 11,449,533*lbs.* in the imports. The returns on the next page is a comparative statement of the importation of tea, before and subsequent to the opening of the trade:—

Comparative Statement of the Quantities of Tea imported into the United Kingdom in the Season 1833-4, being the last year of the East India Company's Monopoly, and the Season 1834-5, being the first year of Open Trade.

Two or three ships of the season 1834-5, which had not arrived, are excluded from this account. Their cargoes were estimated to amount to two millions of pounds. But as the imports of 1833-4 were about 1,500,000 pounds short of the average of preceding years, the imports of the first year of free-trade may be considered to have been twelve millions of pounds greater than the annual shipments under the East India Company's Monopoly.

COLONIAL STATISTICS.

Return from each COLONY or FOREIGN POSSESSION of the British Crown: stating the year in which it was captured, ceded by treaty, or settled; the number of the Population, distinguishing white from coloured, and free from slaves; also the value of exports and imports into each of those colonies.

Those with a * affixed have a Legislative Assembly; those without are governed by the orders of the king in council. T. denotes ceded by treaty; c. captured; s. settled by the British power.

TURNPIKES IN GREAT BRITAIN.

1. 1829 the extent of turnpike-roads was, in England, 18,244 miles; Wales, 2,631; Scotland, 3,666: total length in Britain, 24,541 miles. Between 1818 and 1829 the length of turnpikes had increased in England and Wales 1000 miles. From accounts of turnpike trusts for the year ending Dec. 31, 1834, it appears there are in England and Wales 1,108 trusts; the number of surveyors is 912; treasurers, 822; clerks, 771. The following is the general state of the trusts in that year:—

	England.	Wales.
Income from tolls, fines, parish composition in lieu of statute-duty, &c. . .	1,656,417	97,127
Expenditure in labour, materials, interest of debts, law-charges, &c. . .	1,725,647	103,083

SHIPWRECKS.

1. Number of ships and vessels belonging to the United Kingdom which were wrecked or lost in the periods specified below, appears, by a return made to a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to inquire into the causes of the increase of shipwreck, from the books of Lloyd's, to be as follows:—

Number of Vessels Stranded or Wrecked.
1817 . . .	362	1834 . . .	454
1818 . . .	409	1835 . . .	524
	1,114		1,573

Number of Vessels Missing or Lost.

1816	19	1833	56
1817	40	1834	43
	89		129

Taking the number of vessels wrecked and lost in the two periods named above at the assumed value of 5000*l.* for each ship and cargo, on the average of the whole, the loss of property occasioned by these wrecks would amount, in the first three years, to 6,015,000*l.*, being an average of 2,005,000*l.* per annum; and in the last three years to 8,510,000*l.*, being an average of 2,836,666*l.* per annum.

2. Number of ships in each of the years above specified of which the entire crews were drowned, though the exact number of each crew is not stated, appears, from the books of Lloyd's, to have been as follows:—

Number of Vessels in each Year, of which the entire Crews were Drowned.
1816	15	1833	38
1817	19	1834	24
1818	15	1835	19
	49		81

3. Number of persons drowned in each of the years specified, in addition to the above, and of which the number drowned belonging to each vessel is distinctly known, appears, by the same return from Lloyd's books, to be as follows:—

Number of Persons drowned in each Year by Ships named.

1817	499	1834	578
	1,700		1,714

4. Among the various causes of ship wreck which appear susceptible of removal or diminution, the following appeared to the Committee to be the most frequent and the most generally admitted:—Defective construction of ships; inadequacy of equipment; imperfect state of repair; improper or excessive loading; inappropriateness of form; incompetency of masters and officers; drunkenness of officers and men; operation of marine insurance; want of harbours of refuge; imperfection of charts.

ASSESSED TAXES.

The rental charged to the assessed taxes in Britain amounted to 10,261,334*l.* in the year 1821; to 11,106,237*l.* in 1826; and to 12,629,980*l.* in 1832; but in 1823, the tax upon houses rented under 10*l.* was repealed. This produced, in the year previous to the repeal, the sum of 1,171,667*l.* The total amount is distinguished into classes, which, for the year 1832, may thus be stated, together with the number of houses to which the amount was charged:—

The inhabited house-duty, on which the above is founded, was repealed in 1834.

The number of male domestic servants, with the amount which the tax on them produced, was as follows in the specified years:—

	Number.	Duty.
1820	85,344	£319,087
1823	85,731	158,630

1832	103,381	187,280

classified so as to exhibit the number of servants, from one to eleven and upwards, in the employ of individuals, with the amount of duty contributed under each head. It applies to the year 1834, and is limited to domestic servants:—

LEGACY DUTY.

A Return showing the amount of capital on which the several rates of Legacy-duty were paid in Britain, in the years 1834-5—namely:—

Rate of Duty	1834.	1835.
2½ do.	160,338	206,593

For the two years the capital amounts to 82,667,288*l*. A similar return for Ireland exhibits the extraordinary difference in the circumstances of the two countries: the amount of capital on which duty was paid being, for the two years, 4,545,765*l*.

It appears from a Return, dated May, 1835, that the total amount of money paid by the Treasury on account of this Inquiry from 1818 to 1835 was 208,527*l*. 13*s*. The proceedings under the commission had terminated in twenty-eight counties of England and six of Wales. In the counties of Berks, Dorset, Essex, Kent, Middlesex, and Sussex, the inquiry was not completed. In Berkshire, Kent and Sussex, the charities for education only had been investigated. In Dorsetshire, 56 parishes, townships, and chapelries had been investigated; in Essex, 52; and in Middlesex, 88. The Return states that there are no means of forming a definite opinion as to the extent to which these counties are unfinished. In addition to the above-mentioned six counties, the cities of London and Westminster, and the charities under the management of the chartered companies of London were unfinished. In the city of London, the charities of 140 parishes, and the education charities in two others; and in the city of Westminster, the charities of three parishes, and the education charities of four others, had been investigated. The charities under the management of the corporation of London, and of 39 chartered companies, had been investigated. In the following counties the inquiry had not been commenced:—in England,—Cambridge, Chester, Cornwall, Hereford, Leicester, Lincoln; in Wales,—Brecon, Denbigh, Flint, Glamorgan, Montgomery, Radnor. The number of charities investigated in each county in England was as follows:—Bedford, 270; Berks, 89; Bucks, 700; Cumberland, 311; Derby, 1003; Devon, 1736; Dorset, 172; Durham, 345; Essex, 324; Gloucester, 996; Hereford, 174; Hertford, 698; Huntingdon, 226; Kent, 139; Lancaster, 1181; London—parishes, 947; also charities under the management of the corporation of London, and of the chartered companies, 665; and in Middlesex, including the city of Westminster, 925; Monmouth, 235; Norfolk, 1710; Northampton, 721; Northumberland, 170; Nottingham, 567; Oxford, 849; Rutland, 70; Salop, 743; Somerset, including Bristol, 1621; Southampton, 553; Stafford, 1124; Suffolk, 986; Surrey, including Southwark, 837; Sussex, 90; Warwick, 1030; Westmoreland, 355; Wilts, 750; Worcester, 930; York, 2603; general charities, 13.—Total, 26,751. In Wales —Anglesey, 277; Cardigan, 36; Carmarthen, 139; Carnarvon, 102; Merioneth, 140; Pembroke, 106.—Total, 894.

In 1835 the appointment of the ex-chancellor, lord Brougham, and sir E. B. Sugden, with other new commissioners, it was thought would have rapidly completed this protracted investigation. But this effort terminated like preceding ones, only by a further addition to the mass of reports previously existing, and the undertaking remains unfinished; ministers declining in 1837 to propose a further grant of public money.
